der consideration. Many of the objections, said he, have been answered by gentlemen who were nearer to the scene of action than myself; I shall strive to obviate others. The mode of conducting our affairs in South Carolina does not seem to have been agreeable to the gentleman opposite to me from that State, [Mr. SUMPTER,] and he expresses his high disapprobation of many parts of it. When I disagree with that gentleman, I do it with great reluctance; for no one on this floor has a greater respect for him than myself. In a hazardous and difficult situation, or in carrying on war, or even in great political questions, the best friends may differ in the mode of conducting them; and it has too frequently happened, that such difference has tended to lessen the friendship which formerly existed. Upon the whole, our arms to the Southward were crowned with success: we must presume the means generally used were right. If supplies could have been furnished by the State of South Carolina, it is a pity they were not granted. I say, it is possible General Greene might have pursued a different mode to obtain clothing and provisions. He did not. He was of opinion no other plans could have been successfully followed but those which were adopted. The idea of his being a partner with Banks and Co. seems to be given up by the opposition. The mere insinuation of Mr. Banks and some others can have no influence against such a cloud of evidence and documents. These are so strong for the General, that they would work conviction on the greatest infidel. I shall barely advert to a part of them, as mentioned in the report, and on this head give a few observations of my own. And, first, the application to the Legislature of South Carolina, in order to create a competition: Had he been concerned as a partner or intended to be so, no competition through that channel would have been proposed. If he was to be a partner, the more secret the transaction, the higher the advantage. The bond of indemnity to General Greene, oaths of Banks and Hunter, certificate from Major Forsyth, Nathaniel Pendleton's oath, Charles C. Pinckney's oath, (now Governor of South Carolina) and the certificates of the two Chancellors of South Carolina, who were both high in the Executive, when these transactions should have happened. Besides, sir, if we consider how many partners there were concerned with Banks in the different transactions, had General Greene been one of the company, it must long since have been manifested to the world. The secret could not have been kept; nor can we possibly think that General Greene who was undoubtedly a man of understanding, would have expressed himself in the manner he has done, in the close of his letter from Newport, dated the 24th of August, 1785, had he been a partner. He says there, "Thus have I given your Excellency a short narration of the origin and situation of this matter, and have only to add on this subject, that I never held any commercial connexion with the company, other than what concerned the public, either directly or indirectly, or ever received one farthing profit or emolument, or the promise of any one from them; and my bond of indemnity expressly declares that I have no interest, connexion, or concern, in the debts for which I became bound, all which I am willing to verify on oath. Would he have pledged his honor, his reputation, had he been interested? No, it is impossible! He would have been silent had he been a culprit, and not have challenged the world, as the power of detection would have laid with so many, and the shaft of envy always ready. I hope every man must be satisfied that the General was no partner. The great points of contest before the committee seem now to be—

1st. Did the General enter into these engagements out of personal regard to individuals, without a view to the public interest?

2dly. Was not the good of the public his principal object?

3dly. Under all circumstances, should not his estate be indemnified?

As to the first, I cannot think that the General, out of mere personal regard to individuals, without a view to the public good, would have been bail. He had been esteemed a man of prudence, and was not a person of large fortune. How would he embarrass his family and property in such engagements? Who, under mere motives of friendship, would have done so? The sum was too large; he had no interest. He got no goods or money for himself. He might have had a favorable opinion of some of the company, but his responsibility was become necessary with a view to the public good.

As to the second, public good must have been his principal object. The contracts before made would not have been carried into execution, without the aid of the contract, for which the indemnity was made in April, 1783. A great many articles were absolutely necessary to the army; they were connected with others; the necessities could not at that critical period, or for the moment, be obtained elsewhere. The merchants, as I understand, insisted upon two conditions before they would deliver the goods: 1st, that all the goods should go together; 2d, that the commanding officer should become security. There was a necessity for an additional capital to furnish the means for supporting the army; and as most of the goods were useful and necessary, the residue might be disposed of to the best advantage, and the money arising from them be applied to the payment of the debt. Public necessity and the state of things would oblige the General to agree to the first condition. The compliance with the second condition became a necessary consequence. The General's letter from Newport, and General Wayne's oath, Nathaniel Pendleton's oath, and other evidence, prove the situation of the army. As to the third point, should not his estate be indemnified? Through his zeal for the public good, he has unfortunately involved his estate in difficulty, whatever the conduct of the company might be. The creditors were not to be affected either by the fraud or failure of Banks and the purchasers. General Greene was liable. The General, when he hears of misconduct, does all he can to save and indemnify himself, and through him the United States. Securities were taken in as ample a manner as they could be obtained from the delinquents; and General Greene never wished to call upon the public, until every other means failed. So late as the year 1785 he had still hopes there would be no loss; but when he found the danger, a sense of duty obliged him to come forward to save himself and family, to ask the protection of the public to indemnify him from a debt that he had contracted to save an army from mutiny and disbanding; to protect a country which otherwise would have been exposed. Many exertions had he to make to feed the hungry and cover the naked; were not these for the public good, and shall his private property suffer? Shall his family be reduced to beggary, be stripped of their all, to discharge what the United States are in honor and in justice bound to pay?

Retrospective laws, to affect rights attacked, ought never to pass; but laws have frequently been enacted to indemnify persons for a conduct, though not strictly legal, but founded on the special circumstances of the case—the safety or honor of a nation or army, where the constitutional authority could not come forward in time. Such was the treaty or system formed by the Duke of Marlborough and the great De Witt. The Dutch, instead of punishing their minister, approved the measure; it eventually tended to the safety and honor of the allies. The individual who undertakes risks for his country's good, a magnanimous Government will always sanctify. We should consider the case upon substantial principles, not according to the letter, not act as the Lacedaemonians did to one of their leaders; they fined him for the infringement of the letter of the law, yet for the same act rewarded the hero with a garland. The fine here ruins the General's estate, and the garland alone, I fear, in this country, will not give his children bread or a becoming education.

In our late contest, the common maxims of old nations could not always be adhered to. We were obliged to act according to emergencies. In the case of General Greene, he seems to have intended for the best. He helped to serve and save a country. His merit stands high indeed. I need not repeat the number of his great and glorious actions, which mark him the General and the hero. His name will be handed down with honor to succeeding ages.

Under all circumstances, I think his estate should be indemnified. If the committee do not like the whole of the resolution, let there be a division, as proposed by one of the gentlemen from South Carolina; though I should think we might safely vote for the whole of the resolution, and let the bill make any other provisions which it may be thought necessary.

Mr. LEE, Mr. BARNWELL, Mr. WAYNE, and Mr. BOURNE, R. I., spoke in favor of agreeing to the resolutions, and Mr. MAÇON and Mr. STURGES, against the motion. Mr. SUMPTER closed the debate in sundry remarks on extracts from letters wrote by General Greene during the late war, inserted in Gordon's History of the American Revolution, which extracts contain unfavorable reflections on the militia of South Carolina, and the patriotism of the inhabitants of that State. These reflections, Mr. SWARTEN said, were gross calumnies on, and misrepresentations of the character of that people, which he said were invalidated by facts that at that time took place, and by the general tenor of the conduct of South Carolina throughout the whole course of the war.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

A Message from the President of the United States was delivered by Mr. Secretary Lear, together with two Reports from the Secretary of the Department of War, respecting the situation of affairs in the Western country; which being confidential, the gallery was cleared.

THURSDAY, January 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States," with several amendments; the Senate have also passed a bill entitled "An act for the encouragement of the bank and other cod fisheries, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein," to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

FRIDAY, January 13.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for the encouragement of the bank and other cod fisheries, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein," was read twice and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill "for establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill was twice read and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States;" and the same being twice read, were agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Benjamin Lincoln, in behalf of himself, Cyrus Griffin, and David Humphreys, late Commissioners on the part of the United States for treating of peace with the Southern tribes of Indians, together with the Report of the Secretary of War thereon. Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills granting to the said Commissioners ——— dollars, on account of their extra expenses going to and returning from the treaty; and that Mr. TUCKER, Mr. GILES, and Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay, and to invalid pensions, and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported that they had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

MONDAY, January 16.

This day was principally taken up with the President's late Message.

TUESDAY, January 17.

Mr. TUCKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of peace with the Creek Indians; which was received, and read the first time.

A representation and petition of Christopher Marshall, jr. and Charles Marshall, was presented to the House and read, praying the encouragement and patronage of the General Government in a chemical laboratory which they have erected for preparing sal-ammonia, Glauber's salts, and volatile spirits.

Ordered, That the said representation and petition do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

A bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of peace with the Creek Indians, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States, of the twenty-eighth ultimo, covering a copy of a letter to him from the Attorney General, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a copy of the account for extra expenses incurred by the late Commissioners for treating of peace with the Creek Indians.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, together with the copy of an Act of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, ratifying in behalf of that State, all the articles of amendment, proposed to the Constitution of the United States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the communications from the President, respecting the Western frontiers; whereupon the doors were closed.

THURSDAY, January 19.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to consider and report whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the acts for establishing the Treasury and War Departments, and that Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. BENSON, be the said Committee.

Attorney General—Petition of Catharine Greene.

[H. OF R.]

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information, with respect to the Finances of the United States, as will enable the Legislature to judge whether any additional revenue will be necessary, in consequence of the proposed increase of the Military Establishment.

The House again took up the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the Message from the President of the United States, relative to the situation of the Western frontiers; on which the doors were closed.

FRIDAY, January 20.

A petition of Zedekiah Morgan, praying the settlement of an account against the United States, for services rendered and supplies furnished, in the Quartermaster's Department, during the late war. Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of Catharine Greene, relict of the late Major General Greene; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 23.

The Speaker laid before the House a Letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, covering an account of extra expenses incurred by the late Commissioners for treating of peace with the Creek Indians, pursuant to an order of this House on the 18th instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Speaker laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering his Report, and sundry statements, respecting the finances of the United States, made pursuant to an order of this House on Thursday last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table. Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of Manufactures, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

DUTIES OF ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States of the 28th ultimo, covering the copy of a Letter to him from the Attorney General: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it would be proper to make it the duty of the attorneys in the several districts to pursue the instructions which, from time to time, shall be given them, respectively, by the Attorney General of the United States, in all matters touching their respective offices, and to correspond with him on any matter relative to judicial business, which shall arise within their respective districts, and upon which he shall request information from them. And that it would be proper to make it the duty of the Attorney General to give his advice to the attorneys of the several districts, upon any matter relative to judicial business, which shall arise within their respective districts; and upon which they shall request such advice, or he shall think it proper for him to interfere: and to make it lawful for the Attorney General in any suit, in which the United States shall be a party, or shall be interested, and in any Court whatsoever, to advocate the United States, although such suit shall not have been originally instituted by him, or under his direction; and that, for the purpose of assisting him in the execution, as well of the duties herein assigned him, as of those heretofore assigned him by law, he may appoint a clerk, who, for his services, shall be allowed at the rate of ——— dollars by the year.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that the said committee do prepare and bring in the same.

PETITION OF CATHARINE GREENE.

The order of the day being called for, on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Catharine Greene, several members objected to taking up this subject, being of a private nature, while matters of the greatest public importance demand the immediate attention of Congress. The question being taken, the motion for going into Committee of the Whole was carried, 21 to 16; and Mr. LIVERMORE took the Chair.

After considerable debate, the question was put for agreeing to the first resolution, in the following words:

Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, That the estate of the late Major General Greene ought to be indemnified for the engagements entered into by that General, with certain persons in the State of South Carolina, for the purpose of obtaining supplies for the Army of the United States, under his command, in the year 1783.

Which was negatived, 28 to 25.

The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration a report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Catharine Greene, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MACON then moved that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from any further proceedings on the subject; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOURNE then laid on the table a resolution for referring the Secretary's Report, together with Mrs. Greene's petition, and the vouchers accompanying it, to a select committee, with instruction to inquire into the facts which rendered it necessary for General Greene to become security to Banks & Co., and the nature, circumstances, and amount of the original debt, and the obligation entered into by General Greene for payment thereof; with an account of the moneys or collateral security received by the obligees, or by General Greene in his life time, or his representatives since his death, in part thereof; and the eventual loss which his estate will sustain in consequence of the said securities; and after examining all the circumstances and such further evidence as may be offered relative to the transaction, to report their opinion thereon to the House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting certain documents received from the Legislature of the State of Virginia, respecting lands located by the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, under the laws of that State, and since ceded to the Chickasaw Indians. Referred to the committee formerly appointed on the same subject.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the office of the Attorney General of the United States; which was received and read twice, and committed.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the proposition for apportioning Representatives among the several States, according to the first enumeration—Mr. MURPHY presiding in the Chair—when the report of a select committee came up, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that a bill ought to be prepared for apportioning Representatives among the several States, according to the first enumeration; and making provision for a second enumeration; and for an apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 3d day of March, 1797.

To which the following amendment was proposed:

"And that no greater ratio be reported, than thirty thousand inhabitants for one Representative."

Mr. GERRY observed, that as the ratio of thirty thousand had already received a sanction, the proposed amendment became necessary for the sake of consistency; that the select committee ought not to be left at liberty to bring in a bill according to their own principles, as it was uncertain whether they might not report a different ratio. If, however, gentlemen preferred a discussion of the question after the bill should be reported, he had no objection to having the amendment altered, so that the committee might leave the ratio blank.

Mr. BENSON had no objection to the provision for a second enumeration, he would also agree to that; not that he wished the measure to be at once adopted; but that if a second enumeration appeared necessary, the provision should be ready at hand, without the necessity of passing a new bill for the purpose.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out the clause respecting the ratio of one to thirty thousand; and observed, that as far as he could understand the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GERRY,] it was that, as the House had already, in the former bill, expressed their opinion in favor of the ratio of thirty thousand, and adhered to it, when disagreed to by the Senate, that was a reason why the principle should be established in the new bill which was contemplated. But, for his own part, he, on the contrary, thought this alone was a sufficient reason why the House should not establish the principle; for, having already tried it, and not met with a concurrence on the part of the Senate, they need not go on the same ground again, unless the Senate were known to have altered their opinion.

Mr. GERRY replied, that the gentleman last up had misconceived his idea. He did not mean, that because the House had once adopted, and afterwards adhered to, the ratio of thirty thousand, therefore they should not reconsider the question. His meaning was, that the reconsideration should be made by themselves, and not by a select committee. He wished, therefore, that the committee should be restricted in that particular; and, after the bill should be reported, the House might then go into a discussion of the matter.

Mr. LIVERMORE could see no reason for pointing out the ratio of thirty thousand, unless the House meant particularly to fix upon it. If a decision of the question was intended, he thought it might as well take place beforehand; the decision of the House would be a leading principle to the committee, in drafting the bill, and it would afterwards require a majority to make any alteration. He hoped the question would be taken; and if gentlemen were determined to pursue the old track, the majority would, no doubt, carry it.

Mr. GILES observed, that as the committee would still be authorized to report the ratio blank; it would be unnecessary to discuss the question for the present; as this would not prevent an after discussion, when the bill should be brought forward. The words of the clause did not appear to him to establish any principle; and he hoped they would be retained.

Mr. WHITE thought the clause nugatory, as only forbidding the committee to do what they are already, by the Constitution, prevented from doing. He further observed, that it was not the Senate who had negatived the former bill, but the President of the Senate, who, as Chairman of that body, had decided the question by his casting vote. The Senate was not, at that time, full; and several of the Senators had since come in.

Mr. DAYTON suggested that it might, perhaps, be better to direct the committee to leave the ratio blank.

Mr. WHITE observed, that such a direction given to the committee, would be a dereliction of a principle already established by the House.

Mr. DAYTON denied that the House had established a principle.

Mr. WHITE replied, that the House had established the principle by their former adherence to the ratio of thirty thousand; he wished, therefore, that the committee should report either that ratio or a blank.

Mr. DAYTON asked whether the object in view was not to reconcile the varying opinions of the House and the Senate, by some reasonable compromise?

Mr. MADISON observed, that, as the final decision of the question must be made by a majority of the House, it was immaterial whether it was made the subject of present or of future discussion; but, since the House found so great difficulty in filling up the blank, he thought it improper that a select committee should have the power of doing it. Even if they did fill it up, their decision would not be conclusive, though it might tend to embarrass the House. He wished, therefore, either that the ratio should be previously fixed, or the committee directed to report it blank.

Mr. MURRAY did not consider the proposition in the light of a compromise; nor did he imagine that gentlemen would give up a principle, to which they were attached. A difference of opinion prevailed with respect to the apportionment, resulting from a calculation upon fractions; some gentlemen thinking that the ratio, once determined by the House, ought to be applied to the aggregate number of the inhabitants of the United States, whilst others (of which number he was one) were for applying it to the number of citizens in each State. He hoped that, in the instructions to the committee, either the one or the other principle would be established. Such a previous recognition on the part of the House would facilitate the business of the committee, and show them on what ground to proceed.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed, that if the clause was intended merely to enable the committee to leave the ratio blank, it would be indifferent to him whether it were struck out or not, as he only wished to have a fair opportunity of discussing the subject. But, in his opinion, the words of the clause were intended to establish the ratio of thirty thousand, the very thing which had caused the loss of the former bill. However, as the words were of such ambiguous meaning, as to be thus differently understood by different gentlemen, he hoped they would be struck out.

The question being taken on striking out the clause in question, passed in the negative; after which the committee, having agreed to the resolution and the amendment, rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. DAYTON then moved to strike out the words, "and making provision for a second enumeration," and for an apportionment of Representatives thereafter the 3d day of March, 1797; as he saw no necessity for burdening the people so soon with the expense of a second enumeration.

Mr. WILLIAMSON observed, that although some complaints were made of the fractional parts not being represented, he never could conceive that the framers of the Constitution entertained an idea of a representation of the people distinct from the States, but contemplated the representation of the people of each State, according to some given ratio. No ratio could be adopted that would not leave fractions; and those fractions would be greater in some States than in others. The State which he represented would suffer in that particular as much, perhaps, as any other State in the Union; but those States that will suffer the most in the first instance, will be the sooner relieved, as the fractional parts will probably then be in their favor, provided Congress proceed upon some general rule. In order to remove all complaints of inequality on account of fractions, and to give those States which have large portions of people unrepresented, the same advantage hereafter that other States will now enjoy, he wished to see a second enumeration take place before the expiration of ten years.

Mr. GERRY remarked, that there would have been no dispute about fractions if the ratio had been first established, and provision afterwards made for carrying it into execution; but when it was once known how the principle would apply, and leave greater or less fractions, gentlemen then took the one or the other side of the question, and wished to vary the ratio, as would best suit particular States. This was the cause of that difference of opinion which prevailed in the House and in the Senate. The evil ought to be remedied if possible; and the only remedy he knew, was the proposition under consideration. The principle would be thus established at a time when its future operation cannot be foreseen; and the members from particular States cannot possibly know what number will result from the ratio they fix upon.

Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, observed, that if the representation was apportioned every ten years, with as great equality as circumstances would admit, this would be amply sufficient for the general security.

Mr. MADISON insisted on the propriety of providing beforehand for the census which is next to take place, in such manner, as to render it impossible for local calculations to intrude themselves. If the principle of equality was of one-tenth part of the importance that some gentlemen contended for, surely some precautions ought to be taken to guard against those inequalities that will every day take place, and will by far exceed those which have already agitated the House so much. If it be an evil that one State should have greater unrepresented fractions than another, it would be a much greater evil that any one State should be deprived of, perhaps, three or four members, to whom she has a right. Gentlemen seemed to think that the larger States would not suffer so much from those inequalities as the smaller ones; but he would ask, whether the people in every part of the United States were not to be considered as equal on the floor of Congress? Ten or twenty thousand citizens of New York, North Carolina, or Virginia, when considered in relation to that House, were of as much consequence as the same number in Rhode Island or Delaware; it is not to be considered whether such a surplus rises from ten Representatives, or from a single one.

He could see no objection to the measure but the expense attending it; but he did not think the expense ought to be put in competition with the advantages that would result from it. He thought, even, that there would be a considerable saving of expense in settling the matter beforehand, when much less time will be spent in debate. Had the question been determined at the last session, it would not have cost the community one-tenth part of what it has cost them.

H. or R.]

Apportionment Bill.

[JANUARY, 1792.]

Mr. Boudinot said there was a great difference between the surplus of a smaller State represented by a single member, and that of a larger one, whose representation is more numerous; as the wants, the wishes, and the intentions of the constituents, are better represented in the latter case than in the former. He wished the committee might be left at liberty to devise whatever means might seem most likely to unite both sides of the House; and wished to strike out all the latter part of the resolution, from the words "first enumeration."

Mr. Davron thought it by no means proper, that the present Congress should undertake to legislate, not only for their constituents, but also for their successors in the House, especially in a point which the future Congress will be more competent to decide upon.

Mr. Livermore remarked, that if the ratio be applied to the people of particular States, it will be ever productive of inequality. Although a fractional number may remain as well in a large as in a small State; yet, it will not affect the larger so much as the smaller one. The ratio of thirty thousand gives Virginia twenty-one Representatives; and if there remained even a surplus of twenty-nine thousand, that State could not feel her interests very sensibly affected, and would have little reason to complain; whereas, that ratio operates more strongly against the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Delaware, whose Representatives are so much inferior in number. Delaware, for instance, having but one Representative and a fraction of above twenty-five thousand, would be represented in the ratio of only one to fifty-five thousand. This inequality might be remedied, unless gentlemen, because the scale was now turned in their favor, wished to take all possible advantage of it, and, as far as in their power, to give perpetuity to the law, and make the ratio apply to every future census for ever. But could gentlemen say there is now more wisdom in the House than ever can be collected into it at any future period? Gentlemen had asserted that one hundred and twenty Representatives will possess double that share of wisdom, which falls to the lot of sixty; and this very argument had been strongly urged for increasing the representation to the utmost extent allowed by the Constitution, because the House is then to possess twice or three times more wisdom than is now contained within its walls. Posterity, he hoped, might be trusted to pass laws that will affect their own time.

After some further remarks by Messrs GERRY, NILES, and BARNWELL, a division of the question was called for; and the question being put, for striking out the words, "and making provision for a second enumeration, and for an apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 3d day of March, 1797;"

It passed in the negative—Yeas 22, Nays 36, as follows:

YEAS.—Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, Israel Jacobs, Aaron

Kitchell, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Joshua Seney, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Peter Sylvester, Thomas Tudor Tucker, and Artemas Ward.

The question being then put, for striking out the words, "and that no greater ratio be reported than thirty thousand inhabitants for every representative."

It was resolved in the affirmative—Yeas 32, Nays 26, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John W. Kitter, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Nathaniel Niles, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Francis Willis.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said resolution, amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That a bill be prepared for apportioning Representatives among the several States, according to the first enumeration, and making provision for a second enumeration, and for an apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 3d day of March, 1797: it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. BENSON, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. GERRY, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions, and made some progress therein; when the House adjourned.

Protection of the Frontier.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House copies of the official communications which have taken place between the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania and the Secretary of War, with respect to the raising of troops within, and under the direction of the said State.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House on Monday last, to the bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions; and the same being twice read, were agreed to; and the bill being further amended at the Clerk's table, was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States; which was received, read twice, and committed.

THURSDAY, January 26.

An engrossed bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions was read the third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for making further and more effectual provision for the Protection of the Frontiers of the United States.

A motion being made to strike out the second section of the bill, which contemplates the raising of three additional regiments of infantry and a squadron of light dragoons, amounting in all to three thousand and forty men, exclusive of commissioned officers—

It was urged in favor of the motion, that the Indian war, in which the United States are at present involved, was, in its origin, as unjustly undertaken as it has since been unwisely and unsuccessfully conducted; that depredations had been committed by the whites as well as by the Indians; and the whites were most probably the aggressors, as they frequently made encroachments on the Indian lands, whereas the Indians showed no inclination to obtain possession of our territory, or even to make temporary invasions until urged to it by a sense of their wrongs. A proof of this unencroaching disposition on their part plainly appeared in their conduct, after the victory they lately obtained over our troops; for, when flushed with success, they might have swept the country before them, and penetrated as far as Pittsburg; they contented themselves with the advantage they had gained over their invaders, and did not attempt to invade our territories in return, although there was nowhere at hand a sufficient force to check their career.

The mode of treating the Indians in general was reprobated as unwise and impolitic. The Indians are with difficulty to be reduced by the sword, but may easily be gained by justice and moderation; and, although their cruelties are alleged as reasons for a different conduct, and the sufferings of the white people pathetically deplored, these narratives, it was said, are at best but ex parte evidence—we hear nothing of the sufferings of the Indians—but if Cornplanter's speech were read, it would set the matter in a very different point of view, and furnish a complete answer to all the charges of their accusers.

Peace, it was said, may be obtained from the Indian tribes at a much less expense than would be necessary for the support of the war. To persevere in hostilities would be wasting the public money to a very bad purpose indeed; for, supposing our arms crowned with victory, what are the advantages we may expect to reap from our success? We can only gain possession of their lands—a possession that must long continue unproductive of the smallest benefit, as we already possess land sufficient—more, in fact, than we will be able to cultivate for a century to come.

Instead of being ambitious to extend our boundaries, it would answer a much better national purpose to check the roving disposition of the frontier settlers, and prevent them from too suddenly extending themselves to the Western waters. If kept closer together, and more nearly connected with the old settlements, they would be more useful to the community at large, and would not so frequently involve us in unnecessary and expensive wars with the Indians; but if permitted to rove at pleasure, they will keep the nation embroiled in perpetual warfare as long as the Indians have a single acre of ground to rest upon.

If the citizens of the United States were recalled within their proper boundaries, there they might, for years to come, cultivate the soil in peace, neither invaded nor invading. As the country progresses in population, and our limits are found too narrow, it will then be soon enough to contemplate a gradual extension of our frontier; but, in the mean time, it is an idle profusion of blood and treasure to carry war beyond our present line of forts. It is only exposing our arms to disgrace, betraying our own weakness, and lessening the public confidence in the General Government, to send forth armies to be butchered in the forests, while we suffer the British to keep possession of the posts within our territory.

As long as Britain is suffered to retain these posts, we can never hope to succeed against the Indians; nor ought we to trace our late misfortune to any other source than her still holding them in her possession. Were they in our hands, the Indians could not carry on their operations against us with the same degree of vigor as they now do; for it is from those forts that they obtain their supplies of arms and ammunition, with which they can be at all times plentifully furnished, as long as things continue on their present footing.

Until those posts are in our possession, it will be in vain to send our armies into the wilderness. A body of five thousand men, sent out against the Indians, under the present circumstances, would be as effectually defeated as the smaller ones have already been. In those wilds, our troops have no friend at hand to furnish them with supplies, or to give them intelligence of the approach and operations of the enemy; whereas, the Indians, receiving both aid and information from their friendly neighbors, can preconcert their plans, and choose according to their own convenience, the place and the hour of attack, as they did before.

It was here observed, by an honorable gentleman on the other side of the question, that we ought undoubtedly to get possession of those posts; and that we might have long since obtained it, if we had only laid a seasonable embargo on all the British shipping in our ports; though he doubted whether it would at present be worth while to take such a step, as the English have lost so great a portion of our carrying trade, in consequence of the additional tonnage laid on their vessels.

In favor of the motion, it was further urged, that, supposing even the war to have been originally undertaken with justice on our side—supposing, also, that the national honor and interest called for a continuance of hostilities—yet, as it was by no means either necessary or prudent to invade the Indian territory, as this had been attempted in two successive campaigns, and the event had, in both instances, been such as to afford no very flattering prospect from a third expedition of the same kind, it was thought much more advisable to content ourselves with defending the frontier; and this might be done without making so great an augmentation in the military establishment.

The only use of regular troops on the frontier is to garrison the forts, and to have a standing force in the neighborhood to form a station, to which the militia may resort either for protection or supplies; but as to active service, the frontier militia and rangers were pronounced to be by far preferable to the regular troops, as being more expert woodsmen, and better habituated to the Indian mode of fighting. To defend the forts, a small number of regulars would be sufficient. The present establishment of two regiments would, if completed, be amply adequate to the purpose, and, when assisted by such forces as might at all times be collected on the frontier, would be able to repel every inroad of the enemy.

Experience has proved that the sudden and desultory attacks of the frontier militia and rangers are ever attended with better success than the methodical operations of a regular force. The former are better calculated for expedition and surprise, making unexpected sallies, scouring the country in small bodies, harassing the Indians, and intercepting their straggling parties, by whom their motions are unobserved; whereas, when a body of regulars take the field, encumbered with baggage and heavy artillery, the unavoidable slowness of their movements affords the enemy an opportunity of watching all their operations, collecting their whole force, and skulking in the woods around them till they can seize the favorable moment to strike a sudden blow, which they generally do with success, but which they could never attempt if exposed every hour to the unforeseen attacks of our woodsmen, who would keep their attention constantly engaged in all quarters, and thus prevent them from uniting in large bodies.

It was further observed by some gentlemen, who even admitted the propriety of invading the Indian territory, that, to effect this with success, it was by no means necessary to make such an increase in the military establishment as that contemplated in the bill. The miscarriage of the former expeditions could not (they said) be alleged as a sufficient reason; for it is well known that the former establishment was far from being complete. The regulars intended for the service of the last campaign were to have been above two thousand two hundred; the President was, besides, empowered to raise two thousand five hundred levies, in addition to the regulars; and these would, together, have constituted an army of about four thousand seven hundred men. Had such a body been employed, we might reasonably have expected much better success against the Indians, whose numbers were so far inferior; the whole force of the Wabash tribes not amounting to above eleven or twelve hundred warriors, who never could keep the field for any length of time, but must be soon obliged to disperse, without venturing an attack upon an army of such superior strength.

Instead of this, our army consisted of only about twelve hundred men, and of these not above four or five hundred were regular troops; besides, had even this force been sufficient, if employed in season, the delays that had taken place in the execution of the plan would alone have been sufficient to defeat the intended purpose. During the winter, the law was passed for raising the additional troops for carrying on the war with greater vigor. The whole summer was spent in the business, and the few men that we did enlist were not raised till late in the fall. Collected at length at the head of the Ohio, they fruitlessly loitered away their time, till they finally erected a monument to our eternal disgrace and infamy.

Whatever troops are to be employed, ought to be raised with diligence and despatch, if we wish to avoid a similar miscarriage in our next attempt. The army ought not to enter the Indian country till their whole force is complete. Difficulties, however, and delay, equal to those of last year, may be expected in enlisting the men; and we shall have the officers in pay a considerable time without any soldiers. Perhaps the former pay of the troops was too low, and proper effective men were unwilling to accept of it; if so, let it be raised, let the men be well clothed and fed, and they will more readily engage in the service. Probably, also, the term of three years was an objection with many, who would otherwise have joined our standard. If enlisted only for six months, the ranks will be sooner filled; and this ought to have considerable weight with those who advocate the augmentation of the military establishment, as they cannot but know that, if we set about enlisting the number of men contemplated in the bill, and in the manner there prescribed, they cannot be raised time enough to render any service in the next campaign.

The information contained in the report on the table was not, it was said, to be implicitly relied on. That report was made by a man who had not personally visited the frontier. Others, who had been on the spot, were of opinion that, if two thousand levies had been raised last year, they would have been sufficient, not only for the defence of the frontier, but even for any offensive operations that might have been thought necessary. Such troops, collected in the vicinity, are more competent to the undertaking than the troops now in contemplation. No complaint had been made of their conduct. Whenever they were tried, they behaved as well as the regulars, and, in the action under General St. Clair, they gave equal proofs of their valor.

It was further urged, that the frontier militia are not only equal, but infinitely superior to any regular troops whatever, for the defence of the borders, and that they are, in fact, the only force that can be effectually employed in expeditions against the hostile Indians, whose mode of fighting is familiar to them, and does not strike them with that degree of terror with which it inspires those men who enlist on the regular establishment. These latter being collected in the heart of populous cities, where the face of an Indian is seldom seen, hardly know whether the Indian and his horse are not the same animal. And when they approach the enemy, at the very first shout, even before he is in view, they are terrified at the idea of savage barbarity, which they have ever been taught to reflect on with horror, and, being incapable of resistance, they commit their safety to flight. To prove the superiority of the militia, gentlemen need only contrast the despatch and success of the expedition conducted by General Scott, with the delays, disgrace, and mortification, which attended that under General St. Clair, and consider the difference of the expense on those two occasions.

The expense of such an army as the bill contemplates is an object well worthy of serious consideration, especially at the present moment, when there is scarcely a dollar in the Treasury. Gentlemen would also do well to advert to the progress of this business, and consider where they were likely to stop, if they went on at the present rate. At first, only a single regiment had been raised, and the expense was about $100,000; a second was afterwards added, which swelled the expense to about $300,000; and now a standing force of 5,168 men is contemplated, at an annual expense of above a million and a quarter of dollars. Can this be justified in the present state of our finances, when it is well known that the Secretary of the Treasury, having been requested by the members from a particular State to build a light-house on a part of their coast, declined the undertaking, and alleged the want of funds as the reason?

Our resources, however, might be made to answer for the support of such a force as that which was intended for the service of the preceding year, and there would be little complaint or dissatisfaction among the people. Very few murmurings were heard against the former establishment; but such a one as is now contemplated will be thought extravagant, will breed discontent among the citizens of the United States, and perhaps afford our neighbors in Canada an opportunity to take advantage of our divided situation, and involve us in a war more dangerous than the former which separated us from Great Britain.

Apprehensions, it is said, are entertained, that the object contemplated in raising these additional troops is not so much to punish and coerce the Indians, as to have a standing regular force equal to what the British have on this continent. This is said to amount to about six thousand men, including those in Canada. But it is to be remarked, that the British nation has not above one thousand men within the limits of the United States; and yet, with this handful of troops, they not only keep the Indians in awe, but even, in opposition to the wishes of the United States, retain possession of those posts which should have been ceded to us pursuant to the terms of the treaty. Why, then, is it necessary, for the purpose of establishing posts and garrisoning them, to increase the standing force to so large a number as that contemplated in the clause under consideration? During our late arduous struggle for liberty, when we had to cope with the most powerful nation under heaven, the Commander-in-Chief had never at any one time above ten thousand men under his own immediate command; and if, with so small a force, we were able to effect so glorious a Revolution, there can be no necessity of going such lengths at present, for the sake of establishing a military character. It is strange policy, indeed, to raise five or six thousand men to oppose a handful of Indian banditti, whose utmost amount does not, from the documents on the table, appear to exceed twelve hundred.

We are preparing to squander away money by millions; and no one, except those who are in the secrets of the Cabinet, knows for what reason the war has been thus carried on for three years. But what funds are to defray the increased expense of maintaining such a force as is now contemplated? The excise is both unpopular and unproductive. The impost duties have been raised as high as is consistent with prudence. To increase them would be but to open a door for smuggling, and thus diminish their productiveness. And if those sources of revenue fail—if our finances be thus exhausted in unnecessary wars—we shall be unable to satisfy the public creditors, unless recourse be had to new taxes, the consequence of which may, with just reason, be deplored; whereas, if we but keep our expenses within bounds—if we nurse our finances—we shall be respectable among the nations of the earth, nor will any nation dare to insult us, or be able to do it with impunity.

During the course of these observations, an honorable gentleman asked, whether this was a day set apart for rhetorical flourishes, as the galleries were open, and he saw the short-hand writers stationed at their different posts?

At an early stage of the debate, an honorable gentleman had suggested, that, instead of passing a law for raising at all events the additional regiments, which, for his part, he did not think necessary, the House, if they finally determined the present establishment to be insufficient, would perhaps do better to appropriate a certain sum of money, to enable the Executive to call in such additional aid as circumstances may require.

To this it was objected, that it is the duty of the Representatives of the People, in all appropriations of the public money, to make them for certain specific purposes. To act otherwise on the present occasion would be setting a precedent that might, in its consequences, prove highly injurious; for, although the greatest confidence may safely be reposed in the virtue and integrity of him who now fills the Presidential Chair, it is impossible to foresee what use may hereafter be made of the precedent by his successors, or how far it may be carried.

Against the motion for striking out, and in favor of the proposed augmentation of the military establishment, it was urged: That, as to the justice of the war carried on against the Indian tribes, that was a question which could not admit of a doubt in the mind of any man who would allow that self-preservation and indispensable necessity are sufficient causes to justify a nation in taking up arms. If the present war be not in every respect justifiable, then there never was, nor ever will be, a just war. It was originally undertaken, and since carried on, not for the sake of conquest, but to defend our fellow-citizens, our friends, our dearest connexions, who are daily exposed, in the frontier settlements, to all the rage of savage barbarity, to which they, with their wives and children, must soon fall victims, unless we speedily fly to their assistance; and, although there are some people who utterly deny the justice of any war whatever, this doctrine, however fine in theory, will hardly ever obtain in practice; for, it is to be imagined, that any set of men are of such a passive disposition as calmly to look on whilst their friends and relations are butchered before their eyes, and to refuse giving them every assistance in their power?

The murders and depredations which have for years past been repeatedly committed by the savages, loudly call for redress. From various documents of unquestionable authority, now in the hands of the Secretary of War, signed and attested by the Executive and Legislature of Kentucky, by the District Judge, and the Captains of the militia, it appears, that, from the year 1783 to 1790, there have been, of the inhabitants of that District, or of emigrants on their way thither, no less than fifteen hundred persons either massacred by the savages, or dragged into captivity, two thousand horses taken away, and other property plundered or destroyed to the amount of fifty thousand dollars. And there is good reason to suppose that on the other frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania the number of persons murdered or taken prisoners during the above mentioned period would furnish a list of one thousand or fifteen hundred more.

The white people, it is true, have sometimes committed depredations on the Indians; but the instances have been rare [the honorable gentleman who spoke did not recollect above one or two] of their making unjust attacks upon the savages; nor did they, on those occasions, commence hostilities against them till exasperated by the strongest provocations that could possibly stimulate the human heart. This circumstance may be justly allowed as some palliation of the offence. Even in these instances, however, a few individuals only were concerned; and, when the affair came to the knowledge of the State, ample reparation was made to the injured party. The General Government, too, had shown an equal disposition to do justice to the Indian tribes. Witness the affair of the Cherokees; for, as soon as Congress had heard their complaints of an encroachment made on them by some of the people from the frontier of the Carolinas, immediate orders were issued for obliging the intruders to evacuate the Indian territory.

But, notwithstanding the disposition that prevails, as well in the Legislatures of those States whose frontiers are most exposed, as in the General Government, to cultivate peace and amity with the neighboring Indians, that desirable object is become utterly unattainable in the present posture of affairs. The frontier Indians have killed a number of whites; the whites, in their turn, have made retaliation. Both parties are in the highest degree exasperated against each other, and likely to continue so, in spite of every endeavor that can be made to effect a reconciliation. With minds thus irritated, it is vain to hope for peace, as long as they continue in each other's neighborhood. It is therefore necessary to form a strong barrier, to keep them asunder, unless, indeed, the advocates for a cessation of hostilities would oblige the frontier settlers to abandon their lands. But by what new-invented rule of right should the inhabitants of Kentucky, and the other frontier settlers, be laid under a greater obligation than any other citizens of the United States to relinquish a property legally acquired by fair purchase? Were it even proposed to pacify the savages, by purchasing the lands anew, such a measure would answer no other purpose than that of procuring a temporary peace, which would soon again be interrupted by a war that would reproduce the necessity of again having recourse to the same expedient. We should have to purchase the lands again and again, without end. By thus squandering the public money, year after year, we should swell the national debt to an amount that we cannot possibly foresee. Better at once to make a vigorous effort, to act in a manner becoming the national dignity, and to maintain our ground by war, since we cannot obtain a durable or an honorable peace.

Attempts have, at various times, been made to effect treaties of peace with the Indian tribes with whom we are now at war; and, although these efforts have constantly proved ineffectual, they yet show that, neither the United States nor the State of Virginia were backward on their part to adopt conciliatory measures, and to do away that animosity which had commenced on the part of the savages at an early period of the late war with Great Britain, and had continued to break out at intervals ever since. In the years, 1783, '84, '85, '87, '88, and '90, offers of peace were made to them. On the last mentioned occasion, when a treaty was proposed at the Miami village, the Indians at first refused to treat. They next required thirty days to deliberate; and, in the interim, the inhabitants of Kentucky were expressly prohibited by the President of the United States from carrying on any offensive operations against them; yet, notwithstanding this forbearance on the part of the whites, no less than one hundred and twenty persons were killed or captured by the savages, and several prisoners roasted alive, during that short period, at the expiration of which, the Indians refused to give any answer at all.

On another occasion, the Indians, not content with rejecting our offers of peace, proceeded even so far as to insult us, by telling us we have lands within the British posts, and asking us why we did not go and take possession of them? Will it be said that we are unable to do it? Is this language to be used within the United States? No! We are able, abundantly able to do it, whenever we please; and if we would but retrench our expenses in some instances, which might well admit of a reduction, our ability would still increase; our finances are not quite so insufficient as some gentlemen seem to imagine, nor so easily deranged. We are still able to prove that the boasted efficiency of the General Government is something more than an empty name—we can yet raise both men and money sufficient to defend the nation from either injury or insult.

It is now too late to inquire whether the war was originally undertaken on the principles of justice or not. We are actually involved in it, and cannot recede, without exposing numbers of innocent persons to be butchered by the enemy; for, though we should determine to discontinue the war, can it be said that the savages will also agree to a cessation of hostilities? It is well known that they are averse to peace; and even the warmest advocate of pacific measures must therefore allow that the war is a war of necessity, and must be supported. We cannot, without impeachment both to our justice and our humanity, abandon our fellow-citizens on the frontier to the rage of their savage enemies. And although the excuse may be somewhat unpopular, although money may still be wanted; what is the excuse? what is money, when put in competition with the lives of our friends and brethren?

A sufficient force must be raised for their defence; and the only question now to be considered is, what that force shall be? Experience has proved, that the force employed in the last campaign was inadequate. It is true the establishment was not complete; but who will venture to assert that, if it had been complete, it would have been sufficient for the intended purpose? Are gentlemen who assert this so well acquainted with the circumstances of the enemy, as to be able to give an accurate statement of the amount of their forces on the frontier? There are stronger opinions in favor of an augmentation of the army than can be adduced against it—opinions, given by men of judgment and experience, who have themselves been on the spot, and are well acquainted with the situation of affairs in that quarter. These gentlemen, who must be allowed to be competent judges, are decidedly of opinion that the present establishment, though completed to the last man, will not furnish an adequate force to carry on the war with effect; and that it will be a hopeless attempt to open another campaign, with a less than about five thousand regular troops, the number contemplated in the bill.

Nor ought that number to be deemed extravagant, under an idea that we have only a contemptible handful of banditti to contend with. Their numbers were, last year, from authentic documents, stated at about twelve hundred warriors, from twenty-three different tribes; such was the opposition then contemplated; but it is impossible to ascertain what accessions of strength they have since received, or even what force they had engaged in the late unfortunate action, as the very men who were in the engagement do not pretend to form any just or accurate estimate of the number of their assailants; but there is good reason to suppose that they had previously entered into an association with various tribes, that have not as yet come within our knowledge. The bows and arrows used against our troops on that occasion, afford a convincing proof that they had foes to encounter from distant nations, as yet unacquainted with the use of fire-arms. Nor does the account of the bows and arrows depend, for its authenticity, on newspaper evidence alone; gentlemen of unquestionable veracity, who were personally engaged in the action, have declared that they had themselves noticed the arrows flying.

When we consider the warlike disposition of the Indians in general, and the alacrity with which the victors are ever sure to be joined by numerous allies, we have every reason to expect a much more formidable opposition in the next campaign. It is well known that the savages place all their glory in deeds of war; and that, among them, a young man cannot make his appearance in company till he has signalized his valor by some martial achievement. When, to this powerful incentive, a new stimulus is added by the trophies obtained in the late action, it is presumable that numbers will crowd to their standard; and it strongly behooves us to prepare in time for a much more vigorous effort than any we have yet made against them.

The objections drawn from the increased expense, must entirely vanish from before the eyes of any man who looks forward to the consequences of one more unsuccessful campaign. Such a disaster would eventually involve the nation in much greater expense than that which is now made the ground of opposition. Better, therefore, at once to make a vigorous and effectual exertion to bring the matter to a final issue, than to continue gradually draining the Treasury, by dragging on the war, and renewing hostilities from year to year.

If we wish to bring the war to a speedy and a happy conclusion, and to secure a permanent peace to the inhabitants on the frontier, we must employ such troops and adopt such measures as appear best calculated to insure success. If we delay our determination until the force of the enemy be ascertained, we can make no provision at all; for the nature and circumstances of the case preclude us from the very possibility of obtaining a knowledge of their strength and numbers. And are we, meanwhile, to remain inactive and irresolute, and make no efforts to repel their intended attacks? No! Whatever their numbers may be, prudence calls aloud for provision of some kind. And if experience is to have any weight with us, the example of the French and of the British points out the true mode of securing our frontier, and rendering it invulnerable to an Indian foe. Let us occupy posts in the vicinity of the enemy, let them be properly garrisoned and well provided, and the business is done.

These will afford an opportunity of trading with the friendly tribes, and will prevent all intercourse between the whites and the Indians, except under proper regulations. Should hostilities be mediated by any tribes who are not in amity with us, early intelligence of their movements can be obtained; their marauding parties may either be beaten off on their approach, or intercepted on their return; opportunities may be taken of separately attacking the hostile tribes; their old men, their squaws, their children, will be exposed a great part of the year, whilst the others are out hunting. In short, if fear, hope, interest, can be supposed to have any influence on the Indians, this mode of defence must be allowed to be preferable to any other, as giving the fullest scope to the operation of all those motives.

A different mode has long been pursued in Virginia, and adopted by the inhabitants of Kentucky, but its success has not been such as to offer any inducement to the General Government to follow the same plan. Rangers have there been employed for a number of years to scour the frontiers; and those rangers, too, were expert woodsmen, perfectly inured to the Indian mode of warfare; yet, notwithstanding their utmost vigilance, the savages still found means to commit all the murders and depredations already enumerated. It is true, however, that a frontier militia man, trained up in the woods, may be, in many respects, preferable to a regular soldier, who has not the same knowledge of the country, and of the mode of fighting; but with equal experience, (and proper men, possessed of that experience, may be enlisted on the establishment) regular troops will be found infinitely superior to any militia upon earth.

Every man who has ever seen militia in the field, cannot but know that a very trifling disaster, or a slight cause of discontent, is sufficient to make them disband and forget all subordination, so far as even to neglect the means of self-defence; whereas regular troops, under proper discipline, and acting with greater steadiness and concert, are much more to be depended on, especially when the object of attack is distant, and great fatigue is to be undergone. The militia, in whatever mode they may be called out, will hardly furnish men of the proper description: if large pay be offered, the temptation will equally prevail upon those who are unfit for the service as it will upon good, effective men; besides, some of the States have no militia laws; and, even in those States which have such laws, they are gone into disuse; no dependence can therefore be placed on militia under any laws now existing. There is, indeed, a general militia law now before the House; but if it ever passes, it certainly cannot be passed in due season to answer the purpose of providing for the immediate defence of the frontier. Regular troops must be raised, or nothing effectual can be done; and if to avoid the expense we refuse the only aid that may prove of any real service, we render ourselves responsible for the consequences of this parsimonious policy, which may be attended with the ruin and destruction of our fellow-citizens in the Western country.

The Congressman's speech was again mentioned and called for; but, as it had been confidentially communicated by the President, an objection was made to having it read without clearing the galleries. Whereupon,

An honorable member arose, and mentioned his having read it in one of the public newspapers in the State of New Jersey.

To this it was answered, that if any gentleman had the newspaper to produce, the speech might be publicly read from that; otherwise, although it might be very proper that the speech itself should be read, yet, as it had been confidentially received from the Executive, there would be a manifest trespass on propriety and decorum in having it read with open galleries; it was therefore wished that the galleries might be cleared.

The Parliamentary etiquette requiring that this should be done by the House, and not by a committee, the committee rose for the purpose; and, the Speaker having resumed the Chair, the motion for clearing the galleries was renewed.

An objection was here started by an honorable gentleman in favor of the augmentation, who said that, as some gentlemen had spoken on the popular side of the question, whilst the galleries had been open, it was unfair to preclude those of opposite sentiments from an opportunity of answering their arguments in the same public manner, and proving to the people the justice and necessity of the war.

The motion, however, was persisted in, and the galleries were cleared.

[The speakers in this day's debate were MESSRS. WAYNE, GOODRUE, BORDINOT, LIVERMORE, STEELE, PARKER, BOURNE, (Rhode Island,) WHITE, and MOORE. Mr. WHITE and Mr. MOORE opposed the motion; they were in favor of the augmentation proposed in the bill. The other gentlemen were in favor of striking out the clause.]

FRIDAY, January 27.

The Speaker laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, covering his account of indents of interest received and issued between the first of October, and the thirty-first of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. MERCER rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I originally opposed the reference of this subject to the Secretary of the Treasury, on principles supported by the Constitution, by the theory of free Government, and from practical observation on the progress of our own, and I believe the result now before us will fully exemplify every evil predicted.

Let any man examine this bill, and compare it with the terms of the original reference. Let it then be asked, whether the submission to devise ways and means to provide for the defence of the Western frontier, authorized the plans proposed by the Treasury Department, that we are now giving sanction to? Did it authorize a perpetual tax, irrepealable by the whole Legislature, without a breach of faith, according to received doctrine? At least, so far placing the purse-strings in the hands of the Executive, who may refuse an assent to the repeal; in the power of the Senate also, and consequently beyond the reach of the Representatives of the people, who alone are deputized by, and may be recalled by the great mass of society, and to whom the Constitution expressly confines the power of originating money bills. Have we, in truth, originated this money bill? Do we ever originate any money bill? If a reference, such as made to the Secretary, was proposed to the Senate, who are a branch of the Legislature, nearly of equal importance with ourselves, would it not be held a breach of the Constitution? Were they to propose such a plan as this to us, would it not be received with indignation? Why so little jealousy of the Executive Department, separated by the Constitution with so much care from us? Of the Treasury Department, too, which is considered in other countries as possessing and exercising the means of corruption? It is in my judgment a direct infraction of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, of the principles of free Government, and I have heard no attempt to defend it, but on the ground of pitiful evasion, more dishonorable to ourselves and dangerous to the public, than an open violation, that would rouse their resentment and insure opposition.

But did the submission of a provision to defend the frontier authorize a system for the encouragement of manufactures? Thereby placing the occupations and productive labor of our citizens under the direction of Government, and rendering the living of the artist and subsistence of the farmer, so far equally dependent on and subservient to the views of Administration? Did it authorize an entire provision for the public debt, past, present, and to come? Did it authorize a plan for supplying former deficiencies, which it is admitted do not exist? Lastly, did it authorize an extensive increase of the Sinking Fund, which we are informed is one of the principal objects? It would be an affront to common sense to answer one of these queries in the affirmative—it authorized none of them. And yet these are all its offspring; these are the great objects it produced. It is true there are in the bill two or three little clauses that were authorized, and which relate to the submission, and which might well have escaped my attention, and would probably never attract the observation of the public, but for the title—a bill for the protection of the frontiers. By these clauses five hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars of the whole money to be forever raised from its perpetual revenue, are appropriated for this year's campaign. After that sum is expended, we must, even the next year, look out for new taxes, and upon the same principles, as long as the Indian war continues (and by the enlistments it is not contemplated to be of very short duration) new taxes must be provided, for the residue of these taxes are by this bill appropriated to other purposes, for ever, after five hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars are paid. This appropriation is unalterable even by the whole Legislature, unless by a breach of public faith, or providing other equal revenue. Should every year's Indian war, and every national disaster excuse Government for laying a perpetual tax, equal to the increased annual demand, it will be selling us defeats at a very high price; and if Government are paid so well, they may be tempted to repeat the tragical representation.

But what is the reflection that naturally arises from a contemplation of this bill. That Administration will not even permit us to defend the helpless women and children of the frontier from the brutal ferocity of a savage foe, but on condition that the Representatives surrender up forever the sacred trust of the Constitution, and place in the power and under the control of the Executive and Senate, a perpetual tax. Unless they throw the power of regulating the labor and industry of their fellow-citizens into the hands of Government, and into a mean dependence on Administration; and unless they furnish a large sum of money, under the denomination of a Sinking Fund, for the purposes of speculation, in order to raise and lower the price of stocks at pleasure, or as may suit the views and interest of the band of favorites that are in the secret.

Hard and oppressive conditions! Was this the object of the reference to the Secretary? It was not the avowed one, nor could it have been suspected, from a simple proposition to devise ways and means to defend the frontier. A mighty fabric has been erected on this slight foundation, to hurry us into its adoption. We have been officially, I suppose, informed that the money for the War Department is almost expended; that the preparations for the Western expedition must stop, unless we pass the bill immediately; and thus, with the tomahawk suspended over our heads, we must give up to Administration the dearest interests of the people, and sacrifice the most sacred rights of the Constitution.

H. OF R.]

Protection of the Frontier.

If anything can equal the boldness of this measure, it is its injustice. I have long remarked in this House, that the Executive, or rather the Treasury Department, was really the efficient Legislature of the country, so far as relates to the revenue, which is the vital principle of Government. The clause of the Constitution confining to the immediate Representatives of the people, in this House, the origination of money bills, is converted into a Committee of Sanction, that never withholds its assent; a convenient cloak to divert the blame of odious measures from the real authors. We have heard of corrupt majorities in British Parliaments. I will not suppose an improper motive in any member of this body, but I am free to say that we appear better trained than any House of Commons I have yet read of; for if a Minister, with them, was to attempt to supply all the ordinariness and extraordinary of Government by perpetual taxes, I am persuaded he would risk his head. The Representatives of the British nation, the immediate agents of the people, dare not vote away the rights of their principals and the power of their successors. They preserve the purse-strings in their own hands, by laying taxes for the support of Government from year to year; they know no permanent taxes, except those pledged for certain debts—and even those the whole nation now exclaims against, as the mortal poison of the Constitution—and the settlement for the support of the Crown, given in exchange for the feudal and constitutional rights relinquished by the King.

When this tax-law made its first appearance from the Treasury Department, petitions against it from the great commercial capitals of America, convenient to us, were presented. The petitioners represented the impositions on commerce as already oppressive and intolerable. Their particular Representatives seemed to sympathize at first with these sentiments. I hope it was not intended to enhance this measure as a boon, in order to demand some greater sacrifice as an equivalent. But certainly when these objections were admitted to be valid, and a proposal was made to render the evils temporary, by limiting the bill to a short period, and in order that it might be commensurate with the original purpose, the Indian war—the encouragement of manufactures, stability in commercial arrangements, a variety of new purposes for money, former deficiencies, and a Sinking Fund, were then vaunted forth as the objects of the measure. These were certainly never the objects of the reference, and show, at one view, how iniquitous and dangerous it is to blend temporary objects with permanent regulations, and connect necessary and indispensable provisions with measures of doubtful, if not unjust policy.

Independent of the constitutional question of the right of Congress, why should we be compelled to consider the extensive range and delicate refinement of encouraging manufactures by extensive duties operating as indirect bounties, under the pressure of providing for an Indian war? Putting out of view the general and irrefragable principle, that industry will almost always select the most beneficial channels for its streams to flow in, and that for Government to attempt to divert its course, as it can only be done by the obstructing in part and opening in another, is not only impolitic and imprudent, but unjustifiable and tyrannical; yet even such encouragement, if proper, should certainly not be permanent. A manufacture that will not, after a sufficient stimulus, support itself, ought not to be encouraged. When it no longer needs aid, the tax ought to be withdrawn; but as there is no limitation proposed, as the law is perpetual, a repeal at any time would be construed into a breach of faith, by those who embarked capitals on the proffered encouragement. But we should recollect, that this not only operates unequally in the same States, between the farmer and mechanic—the staple States are unequally represented in this Government—that we are differently, therefore, interested with respect to manufactures; that these bounties are in fact paid from the staples of the Southern States, by producing retaliating regulations in their only markets abroad, and raising the price of what the planters must buy at home. In fine, such precipitate measures seemed calculated to sow discontent, in order to reap confusion, and out of confusion it is said or der arises; that is, it gives countenance to the abuse and desertion of all free Governments, and the introduction of despotism in its stead. With respect to stability in commercial regulations as necessary to mercantile calculations—if duties have a certain limit, calculations may as well be made on that limitation as on permanency; but surely these arguments have been advanced by the advocates of the bill with one eye shut. They have not even squinted at that part of this same bill which limits the continuation of the increased duties on three-fourths of the articles of importation to a short period; their hearers are to be compelled to forget all the arguments on the first part before they are allowed to consider the second.

As to the other purposes and former deficiencies, they were never suggested until some excuse was to be invented; and in this case it seems also unfortunate that this very bill, in one of the latter clauses, states that there is an actual surplus of revenues of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; surely, in such arguments, there is no regard to decency preserved; but, in every view, to lay permanent taxes, without appropriating them to specified purposes, is unsafe and unconstitutional.

As to a Sinking Fund, it is a pretext that will not bear inspection. If it was really meant to discharge the principal of the debt, why not early present a plan as an independent object of deliberation? It is certainly of sufficient magnitude. Why wait until the Indian war was on the tapis? But perpetual taxes are not necessary for a Sinking Fund. Perpetual taxes were never excused upon any other principle but the providing a certain interest to give currency to a fictitious capital. That is not the case with respect to a Sinking Fund; that should be provided and increased as circumstances will permit, from year to year; our successors should be left as free in this respect as we are. Besides, a perpetual tax for a Sinking Fund is an absurdity in language. It is true, where we are constantly increasing our debts, and even when we cannot increase them fast enough, assuming debts of others, a perpetual Sinking Fund may be reconciled to the fact; but that fact must also prove that there is really no serious intention of our paying the debt, but that it is considered as the great engine necessary to influence the motions of Government, and which must ever be preserved when once introduced. That this is the real policy, the use that has been made of the Sinking Fund we now have, will evidently demonstrate. I have, it is true, no official documents, but it has been published in the newspapers, and not contradicted. I have before mentioned it in this House, and it has not been denied. I must, therefore, believe it to be true that the Treasurer of the United States, and other agents for the Department of the Treasury, have gone into market, and given higher prices for stock than individuals purchased at: in this city, at 12s. for three per cents, when they sold at 10s. 6d. at New York—12s. when others could buy at 10s. Is not this throwing away 3s. and 4s. in the pound of the public money, betraying the confidence of the people? Is it not worse—is it not deviating so much to sinister purposes? It is said, that it raises the price on foreigners; the fact is directly the reverse. It raises the price of foreign property on ourselves, for they hold perhaps the greater part of this paper. But, on this principle, we should go on until we stimulate the six per cents, to 30s. in the pound, to make it equal to money at 4 per cent., at which rate it is said foreigners now lend to us. We certainly, on their own principles, lose more by the difference between 20s., the ultimatum to which we now go, and 30s., to which we ought to go to raise our stocks to the price of foreign loans. Then we should lose between 20s. and 15s. or 16s., which is the lowest that stocks could probably descend, whilst we pay the interest quarterly.

But it is asked, Would Government wish to give less than 20s.? The answer is, the money of the people ought to be laid out so as to sink the greatest quantity of the debt. But, again: Government had no such scruples when the debt was principally in the hands of the original holders. They bought up then at 12s., 13s., and 14s., or less, and so on. Why did they not fix then the price at 20s.? Why are mere speculators (I mean not to include those who purchase to hold, for it is their interest to purchase cheap) dearer to Government than those who have gained these debts in exchange for their blood or their property? Why protect those who have purchased 20s. for 2s. 6d. from the soldier and farmer from losing perhaps a tenth of their profits? Why should Government make use of the contributions of these very injured people, as well as others, to increase the advantages of those who have injured them? Why select this particular species of property to raise its value? Why not raise the price of tobacco, rice, and other articles, now so low? Have they not been as honestly earned?

In fine, we have opened a small door, and let us only observe what a host of evils have entered; and then we are asked, Why do we not prepare a substitute? After having compelled us to part with the subject out of our hands, and refer it to a part of the Executive—after it has been cooped up out of doors, and kept back until the cravings of necessity compel the admission of part of the proposals—when we now wish to separate the necessary and useful from the pernicious parts, unjustifiably blended and introduced, we are arrested by the votes of a majority, and even insulted by an abuse of an imputed incapacity, that, if true, would, by degrading the whole Representative body of the people, involve themselves, as well as the minority, in the ignominy. But, surely no two propositions can be more readily distinguished than the increase of revenue for the Indian war, and this complicated, unauthorized, unnatural, unconstitutional mixture of manufacturing, financial, deficiency, sinking fund, and Indian war ingredients.

When Mr. MERCER had concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 30.

The Speaker laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to the directions of the President of the United States, copies of the official communications which have passed between the Executive of the United States and the Governor of Pennsylvania, upon the subject of the temporary defensive protection of the frontiers of the said State; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States, with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; when the same being read, some were agreed to, and others disagreed to.

And then the said bill being before the House, a motion was made, and the question being put to amend the same, by striking out the second section thereof, in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That there shall be raised three additional regiments of infantry, each of which, exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of nine hundred and twelve non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians."

It passed in the negative—yeas 18, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS.—John Baptist Ashe, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, William Barry Grove, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Macon, Nathaniel Niles, Josiah Parker, Israel Smith, John Steele, Thomas Sumpter, George Thatcher, Artemas Ward, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

The farther consideration of the said bill was then postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 31.

The Speaker laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, covering his report on the petitions of James Swaine, Abraham Springer, Timothy Mountford, sundry seamen, Samuel Wail, for himself and servant, John Carnaghan, James Shields, Henry Skinner, and William Loring; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States; and the same being further amended, was Ordered To be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

Mr. PAGE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Churchman, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

An engrossed bill for making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States, was read the third time, and the blanks therein filled up; and, on the question that the said bill do pass, It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 19, as follows:

FEBRUARY, 1792.]

Post Office Bill.

State, the Secretary's and Treasury offices are kept there; that the records and treasury of a large county, comprehending both Portsmouth and Exeter, and extending fifty or sixty miles into the country, are also kept there; and that the Judicial Courts of the County, the State, and the United States, sit there at appointed periods. It is there the Governor convenes his Council, to consult on public affairs; and it is from that place a communication should be kept up between the State and the General Government. From these circumstances, it appears that it would be very convenient not only for Exeter, but for a considerable part of the State, to have an office established there; and as the necessary communication between that and other towns would afford frequent opportunities to send and receive letters by private conveyance, a doubt can hardly exist that such an arrangement would be productive to the revenue. This, I believe, to be the opinion of the Postmaster General. Sir, the distance from Boston to Portsmouth does not exceed seventy miles, and that perhaps the best road within the United States, of equal extent. The objection, therefore, that the stage cannot pass through in a day, can have no weight; it is too absurd to deserve a serious refutation. The difference in the distance between the present route of the mail and the one proposed through Exeter, is, passing through Kensington, about three miles, or by Hampton Falls, about five miles. The road through Kensington is a good carriage road; the stage ran that way about five years ago, before the proprietors contracted for the transportation of the mail; it was then a pretty good road, since which it is much improved. It was, therefore, a false assertion to say that the road through Kensington or Hampton Falls is bad; and I am persuaded that the mail passing that way could not be injurious to Portsmouth. But, sir, the opposition to this measure arises from a rivalry between the two towns. Before the war, the courts and offices, just now mentioned, were held exclusively at Portsmouth; on the commencement of hostilities, it was found convenient to remove them to Exeter, where it has been thought expedient to continue them. But this has excited a degree of jealousy in the minds of some persons, in the interest of Portsmouth, who are perpetually on the watch to oppose any public measure calculated to promote the interest or convenience of Exeter. If this alteration takes place, letters going to Exeter will be liable to a postage of twenty or twenty-five per cent. more than by the present arrangement; and, as the cross-post will set off but once a week, letters may lie six or seven days in the office at Portsmouth: this will preclude the people of Exeter from the benefit of a post, and they will be obliged to send their letters by private conveyance, as they now do. By the original construction of the bill, the expense of transporting the mail would be less than by the proposed alteration; as, by extending the route of the principal mail about three miles further, the travel of the cross-post is shortened fourteen. I therefore hope the people in that part of the State will not be deprived of rights naturally arising from their situation, by the prejudice and misrepresentation of those who wish to injure them, and that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I shall agree to the amendment made by the Senate in this bill, to strike out Exeter, and to carry the mail by the accustomed route, through Hampton, which is the nearest way, as gentlemen have heretofore stated, by about five miles; and it is also the best road, more especially in winter, when the snow is deep, being a road more used, and consequently the paths better kept open. And as the bill provides that a mail shall be carried from Portsmouth, by Exeter, to the interior parts of the State, I think the town of Exeter will be well accommodated, without the deviation of five miles before mentioned. As the stage-carriages that carry the mail three times a week between Portsmouth and Boston, in the summer season, carry many passengers from Portsmouth and from Boston, and other places, a deviation of five miles, and in a worse road, would be a very great inconvenience to such passengers. The distance from Boston to Portsmouth, by the usual route, is about sixty-five miles. This is a pretty long journey to be performed with a stage-wagon in one day, which is the case in the summer season; but five miles added, may induce the necessity of traveling sometimes after night, which would be attended with inconvenience to the passengers, besides hindering the mail from arriving at the appointed hour. The inconvenience would also perhaps be greater in winter, in proportion to the number of passengers, and in respect to retarding the mail, as some part of the new proposed route is considerably more liable to be blocked up with snow, for want of traveling to keep it open, than the old route. Portsmouth being a place of considerable commerce and navigation, it is important that the mail should arrive at its proper times, and as early as possible. The letters for Exeter are few, compared with the number for Portsmouth. The postmaster has stated the amount of the postage of letters for Exeter, passing through his office at Portsmouth, to be about fifteen dollars and a half, in eleven months, from the first of January, 1791; a sum very inconsiderable indeed compared to the amount of postage received for letters delivered in Portsmouth during the same period.

Mr. THATCHER.—I feel, myself, sir, as little interested in the present question as it is possible for the gentleman just now up, from New Hampshire, [Mr. LIVERMORE.] Indeed, I have no other interest in this matter than what arises from a desire to accommodate the greatest number of people; and so far, I confess, I feel interested; for any general measure that does not effect this, gives a certain degree of pain. If the facts that have been stated be true, and the arguments drawn from them in support of the amendment be conclusive, I certainly should be interested in favor of it; because it must immediately affect my constituents. But, sir, the facts are not true, nor the reasoning just. Sir, the real matter in dispute between Portsmouth and Exeter has not yet been understood; and I conceive it to be simply this: Shall the mail from Boston arrive at Exeter about two hours earlier, on the same day, than at Portsmouth; or shall it arrive at Portsmouth first, and at Exeter the next day, or within six or seven days after? This, sir, is the real question; for whether it passes through Exeter, or through Hampton, as it now does, it will reach Portsmouth on the same day it leaves Boston, and about the same hour. If the hour of arrival at Portsmouth be fixed at eight o'clock in the summer time, the post may accomplish the route through Exeter with ease, and he will do no more if he passes through Hampton. This brings us to an examination of the reasons offered in favor of the amendment, which go altogether to show that if the route be established through Exeter, the mail will not arrive at Portsmouth on the same day it leaves Boston, and consequently, the merchants at that place will be injured; and not only so, but it is said, the Portland mail will be delayed another day. Did I believe there was the least shadow of reason for this apprehension, I should be the first for agreeing to the amendment; but, sir, it is all a pretence, a whim, invented for no other reason than to prevent the mail's arriving at Exeter before it does at Portsmouth.

The gentleman [Mr. LIVERMORE] has said the route from Boston to Portsmouth, through Exeter, is about five miles farther than through Hampton. He does not pretend to say it is more. I verily believe the difference is not more than three miles, if it is so much as that; but, for the sake of the argument, I will admit there is the difference contended for by the gentleman. We will examine the question on that supposition, and see if there arises a probability that the increased distance will prevent the arrival of the mail at Portsmouth on the day it leaves Boston. It seems to be agreed, that the old route from Boston to Portsmouth is about sixty-four or five miles. Now, it is a fact, that prior to the building the bridges across Mystic and Beverly rivers, the stage passed this route in a day, although at Beverly ferry it was detained from thirty to forty minutes where it now passes in two, and it was obliged to go round by the town of Mystic, which is two miles farther than where it now crosses on the bridge; by these bridges, then, we may consider five miles taken off the whole distance—so that, admitting the objection of the addition of five miles, as the gentleman wishes to have it, the mail may now pass in a day, from Boston to Portsmouth, through Exeter, with the same ease and certainty that it did before the erection of these bridges through Hampton Falls, the route contemplated by the amendment; and I must beg leave further to observe, that a bridge is will considerably add to the facility of passing, and may well be counted upon as a further deduction of the distance.

It has been said by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. LIVERMORE], that the road from Portsmouth to Newburyport is a good road. I agree with him in this point; I am as perfectly acquainted with the road from Portsmouth to Newburyport as he can be; I know every patch of sand or rock in the way that can impede a carriage; but, as good as it is, I presume he will acknowledge there is more sandy, heavy road for wheel carriages in this part of the line than all the rest of the way to Boston; so that something ought to be carried to the credit of the Exeter route, because it avoids this sand. 'Tis said the road through Kensington to Exeter is blocked up with snow in the winter time—granted as to some particular seasons; but the same is also the case as to Hampton road. I have often known the Hampton road so blocked up that the stage could not run for several weeks. This was the case last March; and I was then informed that the road through Kensington and Exeter was passable for the stage earlier than the Hampton, and it ought here to be noted there is a causeway near half a mile in length in Hampton, over which the passenger is not only difficult in the winter time, but very dangerous if passable at all, as some tides overflow it two feet and more. I passed it last March in this situation. This inconvenience will be avoided by passing through Exeter—and no part of that route is so bad in the winter time as this causeway. I have heretofore traveled in the winter time through Kensington and Exeter, on being advised it was the best road of the two; and though there was much snow on the ground, we found no difficulty in getting along. Hence, sir, it is evident to me, that the mail may easily be carried from Boston, through Exeter, to Portsmouth, in a day; and that the objection founded on the increase of distance is a mere pretence, originating in an unwillingness, in the minds of some people, that the mail should arrive an hour or two sooner at Exeter than Portsmouth.

The gentleman [Mr. LIVERMORE] has said it is a principle of the bill, that the mail shall be carried in the most direct road from place to place, and that it will be a deviation from this principle to go through Exeter. This, sir, is not strictly true; no such principle has been adhered to but in a qualified sense, and it has been departed from whenever it would accommodate any considerable number of people. I wish here to remind the House of Springfield, in Massachusetts, and Middletown, in Connecticut; in the former instance, the direct route from Worcester to Hartford is not through Springfield, but a deviation of near ten miles is made to accommodate that town; and in passing from Hartford to New Haven, a deviation of four or five miles (if I am mistaken, gentlemen from that State will correct me) is made for the purpose of accommodating the town of Middletown. Many other instances of this nature might be adduced, and why shall not a small deviation be now made in favor of Exeter, especially since no inconvenience will result therefrom to Portsmouth? I can see no reason.

In order to convince this House that the mail, in passing from Boston to Portsmouth, ought not to be carried through Exeter, the gentleman has read a letter from the postmaster at Portsmouth, stating the number of letters that pass in a year, by a cross-post, from Portsmouth to Exeter; by which it appears the number indeed is very small.

Hence he would draw an argument that the business between Boston and Exeter is trifling, and not of consequence enough to justify so small a deviation in the mail line of three or four, or, as the gentleman contends, of five miles. But this is strange logic, and a very different conclusion results in my mind from the contents of the letter. The letter may be evidence how little business is carried on between Portsmouth and Exeter, and that consequently there is no real need of a post between these two places; but it does not contain the shadow of evidence that there is no commercial business between Boston and other places in Massachusetts and Exeter. If a gentleman in those places wished to write to Exeter, he would never think of putting his letter into the Portsmouth mail. He must know that it is liable to lie six days in the post office at Portsmouth; and perhaps longer, while various opportunities, by a private conveyance, would present within that time.

I have hitherto admitted the additional distance, by going through Exeter, to be five miles; but, sir, since the mail stage passes Merrimack river, about four miles above the old ferry, (the gentlemen of the House acquainted with that part of the country know the places I refer to,) I cannot agree that this additional distance will be more than three miles, if so much. But, however this may be, I trust I have shown to the satisfaction of the House that, whether it be five or three, it cannot produce any inconvenience to Portsmouth, but must be highly beneficial to Exeter.

There is another consideration, sir, that ought to have some weight in deciding this question, which I will mention, and say no more. It is this: A letter that goes from Boston to Exeter, through Portsmouth, will stand charged twenty-five per cent. more than if the mail was carried directly from Boston to Exeter; while, on the other hand, the postage of a letter from Boston to Portsmouth is the same, whether the mail passes through Hampton or Exeter, because, in both of these routes, the distance from Boston to Portsmouth is more than sixty miles, and short of the next grade of postage. For these reasons, sir, I hope the House will disagree to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH (N. H.) observed, that he was sorry to find his colleagues differing in opinion on the subject under consideration. He had no prejudice in favor of one of the towns (Portsmouth and Exeter) above the other. He only wished the bill might establish that route which would best accommodate the State at large. He conceived, when the situation of New Hampshire was considered, it would be evident that the bill as passed by the House was better calculated to answer this purpose, than it would in case the amendment proposed by the Senate should be adopted. He remarked, that the trade of the greater part of that State had been, and probably would continue to be, with Boston; that, if the general line of the post road should be established through Exeter, it would be, to the people in the interior part of New Hampshire, a saving of at least twenty-five miles in the distance between them and Boston; that the trade of Exeter, though within fifteen miles of Portsmouth, was principally with Boston; that, if the amendment proposed by the Senate should be adopted, they would be deprived of any benefit from the establishment of post roads; that the route would be so circuitous, that the people in the interior parts of the State would probably in future, as they had in times past, send their letters to Boston, and to the Southward, by private conveyance rather than by post. It was easy to see that the revenue, by this means, would be injured; that this circumstance would serve to account for the statement read from the postmaster at Portsmouth, of the small number of letters sent from his office to Exeter. It was his opinion, that the revenue would be greatly increased by taking Exeter into the main post road; and that a contract for carrying the mail from Portsmouth to Boston might, in that case, be obtained for as small a sum as by the road now used. He could not see how this would injure Portsmouth, though it might not prove advantageous to the postmaster at that place. How far the House might think it their duty to consult the particular interest of that officer, he would not pretend to say. He had reason to believe (though he could not speak altogether from his own knowledge) that the account given of the road by one of his colleagues, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, was a just one. Upon the whole, considering the amendments as not calculated to promote the advantage of the State he had the honor to represent, he should vote against it.

FRIDAY, February 3.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill to establish Post Offices and Post Roads within the United States, and do agree to the amendments proposed by the House to their amendment to the said bill.

THE COD FISHERIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled, "An act for the encouragement of the Bank and other Cod-Fisheries, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein."

The first section being read as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the bounty, now allowed upon the exportation of dried fish of the fisheries of the United States, shall cease on all dried fish exported after the tenth day of June next; and in lieu thereof, and for the more immediate encouragement of the said fisheries, there shall be afterwards paid, on the last day of December annually, to the owner of every vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law, for carrying on the Bank and other Cod-Fisheries, and that shall actually have been employed therein at sea, for the term of four months at least, of the fishing season next preceding (which season is accounted to be from the last day of February, to the last day of November in every year) for each and every ton of such vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement, as licensed or enrolled; if of twenty tons and not exceeding thirty tons, one and a half dollars, and if above thirty tons, two and a half dollars, of which bounty three eighths parts shall accrue and belong to the owner of such fishing vessel, and the other five eighths thereof shall be divided by him, his agent or lawful representative, to and among the several fishermen who shall have been employed in such vessel, during the season aforesaid, or a part thereof, as the case may be, in such proportions as the fish they shall respectively have taken may bear to the whole quantity of fish taken on board such vessel during such season. Provided, That the bounty, to be allowed and paid on any vessel for one season, shall not exceed one hundred and seventy dollars."

Mr. GILES, expressed some doubt respecting the principle of the bill; and for the purpose of collecting the sense of the Committee on the subject, he thought the most effectual means would be a motion to amend the bill, by striking out the whole section. He accordingly made the motion, observing at the same time, that he could not positively assert, whether the reasons which determined him against the principle of the bill, were well founded or not; that, in matters where a local preference is given, it is necessary to accommodate; and he would be happy if his objections could be removed. The present section of the bill appears to contain a direct bounty on occupations; and if that be its object, it is the first attempt as yet made by this Government to exercise such authority; and its constitutionality struck him in a doubtful point of view; for in no part of the Constitution could he, in express terms, find a power given to Congress to grant bounties on occupations: the power is neither directly granted, nor (by any reasonable construction that he could give) annexed to any other power specified in the Constitution. It might perhaps be brought in under a mode of construction already adopted by the House, viz: that of "ways and ends," by which any power whatever might be equally implied; but he wished ever to see some connexion between a specified power, and the means adopted for carrying it into execution. There is a great difference between giving encouragement, and granting a direct bounty. Congress have a right to regulate commerce; and any advantage thereby resulting to a particular occupation connected with commerce, comes within that authority; but when a bounty is proposed to a particular employment or occupation, this is stepping beyond the circle of commerce; and such a measure will affect the whole manufacturing and agricultural system. In all cases, the revenue, to be employed in this bounty, is drawn from all the sources of revenue in the United States, and confined to a particular object. He was averse to bounties in almost every shape, as derogations from the common right; and he thought there would be no great difficulty in proving, that a Government is both unjust and oppressive in establishing exclusive rights, monopolies, &c., without some very substantial merit in the persons to whom they are granted; although even in that case, the propriety of such grants is still questionable. Under a just and equal Government, every individual is entitled to protection in the enjoyment of the whole product of his labor, except such portion of it as is necessary to enable Government to protect the rest; this is given only in consideration of the protection offered. In every bounty, exclusive right, or monopoly, Government violates the stipulation on her part; for, by such a regulation, the product of one man's labor is transferred to the use and enjoyment of another. The exercise of such a right on the part of Government can be justified on no other principle, than that the whole product of the labor of every individual is the real property of Government, and may be distributed among the several parts of the community by governmental discretion; such a supposition would directly involve the idea, that every individual in the community is merely a slave and bondman to Government, who, although he may labor, is not to expect protection in the product of his labor. An authority given to any Government to exercise such a principle, would lead to a complete system of tyranny.

He entertained fewer doubts, respecting the principle, as it regards political economy. All occupations that stand in need of bounties, instead of increasing the real wealth of a country, rather tend to lessen it; the real wealth of every country consisting in the active product of useful labor employed in it. It is therefore bad policy to encourage any occupation that would diminish, instead of increasing the aggregate wealth of the community; and if an occupation is really productive, and augments the general wealth, bounties are unnecessary for its support; for when it reimburses the capital employed, and yields a profit besides, it may be said to support itself. When it fails in these points, any forced advantage that is given to it by the Government, only tends to decrease the wealth of the country. The subject however might be considered in a more favorable point of view: and that is, whether the provision be essential to the defence of the United States, and whether the bounties proposed in the bill were more than equivalent to the portion of defence that would be procured by them. The bill does not (in his opinion) contain that kind of encouragement, which is essential to the national defence. Any man who takes a view of this country, must be convinced, that its real support rises from the land, and not from the sea; and the opposite mistake must have arisen merely from a servile imitation of the conduct of Great Britain: the inhabitants of this country heretofore thought favorably of her Government, and the Revolution has not yet altered their former ideas respecting it. But the circumstances of the two countries will, on examination, be found widely different; Britain, surrounded by the sea on every side, finds a navy necessary to support her commerce; whilst America, possessed of an immense territory, and having yet ample room to cultivate that territory, has no occasion to contend by sea with any European Power: her strength and her resources are all to be found within the United States; and if she but attends to her internal resources, the object of national defence will be much better answered.

Mr. G. next proceeded to consider whether that portion of the national defence which might be derived from the fisheries, would not be purchased at too high a price. Although the apparent intention of the bill is only to convert the present existing drawbacks into a bounty; yet the drawbacks being allowed only to the actual exportation of the fish, and the bounty being granted on the tonnage of the fishing vessels, there can be no comparative value between the drawback and the bounty; they have no necessary relation to each other, and the latter may exceed the former, or the former exceed the latter. He had made a calculation, and upon the most favorable principles, grounded on the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State. Here he produced a calculation, tending to show that the proposed bounty on the tonnage of the fishing vessels, would considerably exceed the amount of the present drawbacks. From a comparison between the bounty, and the number of sailors employed in the fisheries, he showed what an expense each man would be to the United States; and, after other remarks, observed, that even Great Britain, whose whole national support and defence depends on her navy, had found, that the men employed in the fisheries, though so necessary for that defence, cost her too much; that America, whose consequence, as a nation, does not depend on a navy, ought to take a lesson from the experience of Britain: that he did not wish to enter into a competition with Britain and France, in supplying the different markets with fish; that, as those nations are able to hold our greater encouragement to their fishermen, than we can to ours, we would, by such a competition, only exhaust the Treasury of the United States to no purpose; and upon this principle alone, he thought there was some reason to doubt the policy of the measure proposed in the section under consideration, which therefore he hoped the Committee would agree to strike out, unless his objections could be obviated.

Mr. MUNNAY observed, that in order to demonstrate the propriety of the measure, it would be incumbent on the friends of the bill, first, to prove that the fishery trade is in a state of decay, that the stock employed in it does not yield the ordinary profits, so as to justify the merchants in embarking their capital in this branch of trade: that there is a system of defence in contemplation, which the circumstances of the country call for, and which this trade is calculated to furnish; that other branches of trade, which do not stand in need of encouragement, are not equally capable of furnishing seamen for the purpose: that this particular object so peculiarly claims the attention and encouragement of the United States, as to leave far behind every consideration of the manufacturing interest, the agricultural, &c. All this he thought necessary for gentlemen to prove, and to show some very strong necessity for encouraging one particular class of men, in preference to all others.

Mr. GOODRICH.—It happens that the fisheries of the United States are almost entirely confined to the State of Massachusetts; and they furnish a considerable, a principal portion of our export trade.

As we are a part of the United States, the United States in general are interested in the prosperity of that branch of business, so far at least as it contributes to the national defence: it furnishes a copious nursery of hardy seamen, and offers a never-failing source of protection to the commerce of the United States. If we engage in a war with any European Power, those seamen will be excluded from their ordinary employment, and must have recourse to privateering. During the late war with Great Britain, we annoyed the enemy more in that line than all others; and had it not been for privateering, it would often have been impossible to keep together our armies, who frequently, in the hour of need, were supplied by the privateers with ammunition and clothing, of which they were wholly destitute. All that we wish to obtain by this bill is, that we may not be burdened with duties. An opinion has been entertained, that no drawbacks ought to be allowed on the re-exportation of articles imported from foreign countries; but if this opinion were to obtain in practice, and no drawbacks were to be admitted, we must confine our importation to articles for our own consumption. The drawback, allowed by the existing law, on the exportation of salt fish, was calculated to be only equal to the duty beforehand paid on the quantity of salt used in curing the fish; but the fishermen complain that, as the act now stands, they are wholly excluded from any participation in the benefit, which centres entirely in the coffers of the merchants. The object of the present bill is, only to repay the same money into the hands of those persons who are immediately concerned in catching the fish; and there can be no reasonable objection be made to such a transfer of the drawback, as Government will not lose a single dollar by the change. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] talks of the unconstitutionality of granting bounties; but no bounty is required. We only ask, in another mode, the usual drawback for the salt used on the fish. If we can make it appear that the bill does not contemplate any greater sums to be drawn from the Treasury, than are already allowed, it is to be hoped that no further opposition will be made to the measure: and that this is really the case, can be proved by documents from the Treasury office. Here he read a statement and calculation to prove his assertion; and to show that the United States will probably pay one thousand dollars per annum less in the proposed bounties on the tonnage of the fishing vessels, than they would in the drawbacks on the exportation of the fish. The fishermen, he continued, are now under no control; and in consequence of this want of a proper restraint, they often take whims into their heads and quit the vessels during the fishing season. To prevent the inconveniences of this practice, the bill contemplates their exclusion from the bounty, unless they enter into such contracts and regulations, as may be found necessary for the proper and successful conducting of the business, which, from our advantage, would be entirely in our hands, if we did not meet with such opposition and discouragement from foreign nations, whose bounties to their own fishermen, together with the duties laid upon our fish, would, to persons less advantageously situated than us, amount almost to a total prohibition.

In the Report from the Secretary of State, a drawback is contemplated of the duties on all foreign articles, used by the seamen employed in the fishing trade, such as coffee, rum, &c.; but we ask it on the salt alone; nor is it asked as a bounty, but merely as a transfer from the hand of the merchant to that of the fishermen.

Mr. Warren had no objection to give the trade a proper degree of encouragement; but he did not relish the idea of granting bounties; if any gentleman would prepare an amendment, so as to make them drawbacks in fact, as well as in words, he would consent to the measure.

Mr. Ames, after some introductory observations, adverted to the necessity of fixing some point in which both sides would agree. Disputes, he said, could not be terminated—nor, more properly, they could not be managed at all, if some first principles were not conceded. The parties would want weapons for the controversy.

Law is in some countries the yoke of Government, which bends or breaks the necks of the people; but, thank Heaven, in this country, it is a man's shield—his coat of mail—his castle of safety. It is more than his defence: it is his weapon to punish those who invade his rights—it is the instrument which assists—it is the pace that rewards his industry.

If I say that fishermen have equal rights with other men, every gentleman feels in his own bosom a principle of assent. If I say that no man shall pay a tax on sending his property out of the country, the Constitution will confirm it; for the Constitution says, no duty shall be laid on exports. If I say, that on exporting dried fish, the exporter is entitled to drawback the duty paid on the salt, I say no more than the law of the land has confirmed. Plain and short as these principles are, they include the whole controversy. For I consider the law allowing the drawback as the right of the fishery; the defects of that law as the wrong suffered, and the bill before us as the remedy. The defects of the law are many and grievous. Supposing 340,000 quintals exported—

The salt duty is -	-	-	-	$42,744
The drawback is only	-	-	-	34,000
Loss to the fishery	-	-	-	8,744
Whereas Government pays $45,900, at 13½ cts., including charges, which are 3½ cts. on a quintal: which is beyond what the fishery receives	-	-	-	11,900
Being a clear loss to the Government of	-	-	-	3,156

So that though the whole is intended for the benefit of the fishery, about one-fourth of what is paid is not so applied: there is a heavy loss both to Government and the fishery. Even what is paid on the export is nearly lost money; the bounty is not paid till the exportation, nor then, till six months have elapsed; whereas the duty on salt is paid before the fish is taken: it is paid to the exporter, not to the fisherman. The bounty is so indirect, that the poor fisherman loses sight of it. It is paid to such persons, in such places, and at such periods, as to disappoint its good effects; passing through so many hands, and paying so many profits to each, it is almost absorbed. The encouragement, too, is greatest in successful years, when least needed; and is least in bad fishing seasons, when it is most needed. It is a very perplexed, embarrassing regulation to the officers of Government and to the exporter; hence the great charge; and, with all this charge and trouble, it is liable to many frauds. Four hundred miles of coast, little towns, no officer. All these defects the bill remedies; and, besides, gives the money on condition that certain regulations are submitted to, which are worth almost as much as the money. The bill is defended on three grounds. First, it will promote the national wealth; second, the national safety; third, justice requires it: the last is fully relied on.

To show that the fishery will increase the wealth of the nation, it cannot be improper to mention its great value. The export before the war brought more than a million of dollars into this country; probably it is not less at present, and no small part in gold and silver. It is computed that thirty thousand persons, including four thousand seamen, subsist by it. Many say, very composedly, if it will not maintain itself, let it fall. But we should not only lose the annual million of dollars which it brings us, an immense capital would be lost. The fishing towns are built on the naked rocks, or barren sands, on the side of the sea. Those spots, however, where trade would sicken and die—which husbandry scorns to till—and which Nature seems to have devoted to eternal barrenness, are selected by industry to work miracles on. Houses, stores, and wharves, are erected, and a vast property created, all depending on this business. Before you think it a light thing to consign them to ruin, see if you can compute what they cost; if they outrun your figures, then confess that it would be bad economy, as well as bad policy, to suffer rival nations to ruin our fishery. The regulations of foreign nations tend to bring this ruin about. France and England equally endeavor, in the language of the Secretary of State, to mount their marine on the destruction of our fishery. The fishers at Newfoundland are allowed liberal bounties by the English Government; and, in the French West Indies, we meet bounties on their fish and duties on our own, and these amount to the price of the fish. From the English islands we are quite shut out; yet such is the force of our natural advantages, that we have not yielded to these rivals. The Secretary of State has made these statements in his Report.

The more fish we catch the cheaper; the English fish will need a greater bounty; whereas if we should yield, the English would probably need no bounty at all; they would have the monopoly. For example; suppose the English can fish at two dollars the quintal—we catch so much that we sell at one dollar and two-thirds: the loss to them is one-third of a dollar on each quintal. They increase our fishery, a greater and a greater bounty is needed by foreign nations. The contest so painfully sustained by them must be yielded at last, and we shall enjoy alone an immense fund of wealth to the nation, which Nature has made ours; and though foreigners disturb the possession, we shall finally enjoy it peaceably and exclusively. If the lands of Kentucky are invaded, you drive off the invader; and so you ought. Why not protect this property as well? These opinions are supported by no common authority. The State of Massachusetts having represented the discouragements of the fishery, the subject has received the sanction of the Secretary of State; he confirms the facts stated in the petition; he says it is too poor a business to pay anything to Government.

Yet, instead of asking bounties, or a remission of the duties on the articles consumed, we ask nothing but to give us our own money back, which you received under an engagement to pay it back, in case the article should be exported. If nothing was in view, therefore, but to promote national wealth, it seems plain that this branch ought to be protected and preserved; because, under all the discouragements it suffers, it increases, and every year more and more enriches the country, and promises to become an inexhaustible fund of wealth.

Another view has been taken of the subject, which is drawn from the naval protection afforded, in time of war, by a fishery. Our coasting and foreign trade are increasing rapidly; but the richer our trade becomes, the better prize to the enemy: so far from protecting us, it would be the very thing that would tempt him to go to war with us. As the rice and the tobacco planter cheerfully pay for armies, and turn out in the militia to protect their property on shore, they cannot be so much deceived as to wish to have it left unprotected when it is afloat; especially when it is known that this protection, though more effectual than the whole revenue expended on a navy could procure, will not cost a farthing; on the contrary, it will enrich while it protects the nation. The coasters and other seamen, in the event of a war, would be doubly in demand, and could neither protect themselves nor annoy the enemy to any considerable degree; but the fishermen, thrown out of business by a war, would be instantly in action. They would, as they formerly did, embark in privateers; having nothing to lose, and everything to hope, they would not dishonor their former fame. Their mode of life makes them expert and hardy seamen. Nothing can be more adventurous. They cast anchor on the banks, three hundred leagues from land, and with a great length of cable ride out the storms of winter. If the gale proves too strong they often sink at their anchors, and are food for fish which they came to take; forever wet, the sea almost becomes their element. Cold and labor, in that region of frost, brace their bodies, and they become as hardy as the bears on the islands of ice: their skill and spirit are not inferior: familiar with danger, they despise it. If I were to recite their exploits, the theme would find every American heart already glowing with the recollection of them; it would kindle more enthusiasm than the subject has need of. My view is only to appeal to facts, to evince the importance of the fishery as a means of naval protection. It is proper to pass over Bunker's Hill, though memorable by the valor of a regiment of fishermen; nor is it necessary to mention, further, that five hundred fishermen fought at Trenton.

It is known, that the privateers manned by fishermen, in want of everything, not excepting arms, which they depended on taking from their enemies, brought into port warlike stores of every kind, as well as every kind of merchandise sufficient for the army and the country: the war could not have been carried on without them. Among other exploits almost beyond belief, one instance is worth relating: these people, in a privateer of sixteen guns, and one hundred and fifty men, in one cruise, took more than twenty ships, with upwards of two hundred guns, and nearly four hundred men. The privateers from a single district of Massachusetts, where the fishery is chiefly seated, took more than two thousand vessels, being one-third of the British merchant vessels, and brought in near one thousand and two hundred. An hundred sail of privateers, manned by fishermen, would scour every sea in case of a war.

Some gentlemen think of a navy: but what navy could do more? What nation would provoke a people so capable of injuring them? Could fifty ships of the line afford more security? and yet this resource of the fishery, always ready, always sufficient, will cost nothing. The superior naval force of our foes should not discourage us; our privateers would issue like so many swordfish to attack the whale. I leave these observations to their weight, and forbear to press them further; strong as I think them, I rest my support of the bill on another ground. I will only ask whether you will oppress, if you will not encourage them? Whether, if you will not give them the money of the public, you will partially seize their own? This is all they ask. If your policy demands for them so much, will your justice deny them so little?

I have repeatedly asserted that the bill will not cost the public a farthing; you only take the money which the fishery brings into the Treasury for the salt duty, and pay the same, or a less sum, back in bounties, instead of a drawback on the exportation of the fish. Here I rest the argument. Before I adduce my proofs, I cannot forbear to lay open the state of my mind. I rely on the truth of the facts I propose to offer. I rely on the proof of them, being as near demonstration as the nature of the case will admit. I make no doubt of the good sense and good intentions of the gentlemen whom I wish to convince; and yet I am sorry to say I am far from being sanguine in the hope of gaining a single vote for the bill. I will explain my meaning, and then I think no gentleman will take exception at it. This debate depends on calculation. In print or writing, or in private conversation, figures have the advantage of every other mode of investigation: the mind is fixed to a point, and made to perceive it clearly. But in public debate it is otherwise. Figures not only disgust attention, but, as the mind cannot carry them along, they confound it; they make a plain thing look mysterious, and bring it into suspicion. When I ask of the Committee a hearing, and it is granted, I get nothing: I want a close attention; and I have to beg, and earnestly too, that gentlemen will not trust their first opinions and vote against the bill, without condescending to receive and to weigh the facts and calculations of its advocates.

Cod Fisheries.

The first question is, how much does Government receive by the duty on the salt used in curing the fish which is exported? The quantity of fish must be known. Several ways of information are to be explored. The Secretary of State supposes the fish of 1790 to be 354,276 quintals. A Treasury return of fish exported from August 20, 1789, to September 30, 1790, which is thirteen and one-third months, is 378,721 quintals. For a year, equal to 340,849 quintals.

Foreign dried fish imported from August 15, 1789, to August 1790, 3,701 quintals; five per cent. drawback thereon is only three hundred and ten dollars, at one dollar and sixty-six cents per quintal. Mr. GILES is mistaken in supposing that foreign fish deducts $16,000 from our estimate. Return of fish in seven months, from May 30, to December, 1790, exported, all fish of the United States, 197,278 quintals; which, for a year, is 338,184 quintals. The medium may be fairly taken for the time past at 340,000 quintals a year.

Six gentlemen of Marblehead certify, that 5,043 hogsheads, or 40,344 bushels of salt were used on 38,497½ quintals; which, for 340,000 quintals, gives 356,200 bushels. The duty, at twelve cents, is $42,744, which Government receives. But the charge to the United States is, at thirteen and a half cents per quintal - $45,900. Whereof the fishery receives ten cents - $34,000 on each quintal exported Charges as the law stands - 11,900. Further, this is but an estimate made up from what the last year proved. The next may be very different, and probably it will be. If more money should be demanded than $44,000, we must not be accused of misleading Congress. But in that case an increase would be made by law; for the more fish is exported the more thirteen and a half cents must be paid; so that the bill creates no burden in that way. But the increase of the export of fish will probably operate in favor of Government. For it is known that the economy, skill, and activity of the fishery are making progress. Its success has progressed. The more fish to a vessel, the cheaper the allowance on the tonnage. Therefore, the tonnage of vessels will not increase in a ratio with the increase of the fish.

The very objections prove this. For they deem the encouragement too great. But any encouragement must have the effect. The difference of the agreements for distributing the fish according to the present practice, or by this bill, makes a great one in the quantity taken. The bill reforms the practice in this point. Marblehead vessels take less than those from Beverly. The former throw the fish into a common stock, which is afterwards divided upon a plan very unfriendly to exertion. A man works for the whole—perhaps twelve hours, and they take about eight hundred quintals to a vessel. But in Beverly, the exertion is as great as can be made; eighteen hours a day, because each man has what he catches, and they catch eleven hundred quintals.

Marblehead seamen sailing from other towns, and dividing as last mentioned, which the bill establishes, seldom fail to catch two or three hundred quintals more than vessels and men from Marblehead on the first plan. Accordingly, I assert on good authority, that the increase in Marblehead only may be computed at fifteen thousand quintals, merely in consequence of the reform by the bill. The best informed persons whom I have consulted, entertain no doubt that the export in case the bill should pass, would not be less than four hundred thousand quintals, probably more; but at four hundred thousand quintals, it would add seven thousand two hundred dollars more to the salt duty; a sum more than equal to any estimate of the actual tonnage, or any probable increase of it - $42,744 - 7,200

Salt duty on 400,000 quintals - 49,944. Other facts confirm the theory, that skill and exertion are increasing in this business.

In 1775, 25,000 tons, 4,405 seamen. Fish sold for $1,071,000. In 1790, three-fourths of the seamen and three-fourths of the tonnage take as much fish. It is owing to this that our fishery stood the competition with foreign nations.

Finally, the average in future may be relied on not to be less than 350,000 quintals.

Salt duty on which - $43,944. Bounties - 44,000.

Wanted - 56. The calculation first made will answer the purpose.

340,000 quintals pay salt duty - $42,744. Tonnage bounty - 44,000.

Wanted - 1,256. This is the mighty defect. Observe the authentic return of the export of fish may be, and we can almost prove it to be, below the future export. Whereas to banish all doubt we go to the top of the scale for the tonnage, we take what we know to be the utmost. This we might have represented more favorably if we had chosen to conceal any thing. But even this will answer our purpose.

For two hundred tons are wanting in the estimate of the bounties, being nineteen thousand eight hundred, not twenty thousand, which will take off one third of the deficient sum.

The tonnage over sixty-eight, which receives nothing, is not mentioned; and which probably is not less than another third.

FEBRUARY, 1792.]

Cod Fisheries.

The boats under five tons though trifling are to be noticed—they receive nothing.

But, above all, the chances of non-compliance with the regulations are in favor of the remainder of the twelve hundred and fifty-six dollars being stopped. Boats may not get twelve quintals to the ton, or vessels may have their voyages broken up, and not stay four months on the fishing ground, in either case they would receive nothing. Take all these together, is it not to be doubted that twelve hundred and fifty-six dollars will remain of the forty-four thousand in the Treasury?

But these are trifles which I cannot believe gentlemen are anxious about.

For the event cannot be reduced to a certainty. What quantity of fish will be exported, no man can tell now. But as Government may receive more than it will pay, the chance may turn the other way, and it may have to pay a few hundred dollars more than it will have received. We have seen that the chance is most in favor of Government. But one chance must balance the other. This answer is sincerely relied on as a good one.

I barely mention that the wear of cordage, cables, sails, and anchors, is very great. These articles on being imported, pay duties. So that it is probable the extra duty paid by the fishery on their extra consumption, will over balance any little sums supposed to exceed in the bounty.

It has been asked, as if some cunning was detected, why if the money received in the Treasury to pay the drawbacks is equal to the proposed bounties, a further appropriation should be made? This cunning question admits of several very simple answers.

The bill being for seven years, the average product is the proper sum to be calculated. But the three first years may fall short of the bounties, say two thousand dollars a year, which is six thousand dollars.

The four last may exceed two thousand dollars, say eight thousand dollars.

Shall a poor fisherman wait for the whole, or if he takes his part according to the money in the Treasury—for a twenty-fourth part of the bounty on his vessel, from 1792 to 1795?

2d. This delay would happen after a bad year, the very time when he would most need prompt pay.

3d. But fish taken this year will not be exported till December next. Therefore the money will not be stopped by the drawback as the law stands, till six months after.

A substitute has been proposed for the clause, to appropriate the drawback only.

This is absolutely improper. For the ten cents allowed as drawback is but a part of the duty paid on salt. It is not easy to see any reason why a part stopped at the Treasury should be equal to the whole paid there long before. The drawback falls near nine thousand dollars short of the salt duty received by the Government. The expense of the drawback would be very heavy and useless.

Nor may gentlemen apprehend that Government, by paying next December, will advance money to the fishery. The salt duty will have been paid, and Government will have the use of the money many months before the fishermen will have a right to call for the bounties.

It is left to the candor of the gentlemen who have urged this objection, whether a better or further answer is desired.

After having laboriously gone through the estimate of the probable export of fish, it will not be necessary to be equally minute as to the quantity or kind of vessels which are to receive the bounty.

The estimate we believe to be very high. That it is high enough, we suppose very probable from the estimate of the Secretary of State, which is only nineteen thousand one hundred and eighty-five tons.

This mode of paying the bounty on the tonnage is very simple and safe. The measurement is already made and costs nothing; and as it was made to pay a duty on tonnage, we are very sure that Government will not be cheated by an over-measure. The mode of paying the drawback, as the law now stands, is expensive, perplexed and embarrassing; liable to frauds and delays.

This intricate and disgusting detail of calculations was necessary to satisfy the Committee that each of the three grounds of defence on which the bill rests, is tenable.

Instead of impoverishing the nation by scattering the treasures of the whole to benefit a part, it appears that we are preserving mine of treasure. In point of naval protection, we can scarcely estimate the fishery too highly. It is always ready, always equal to the object; it is almost the only sufficient source of security by sea. Our navigation is certainly a precious interest of the country. But no part of our navigation can vie with the fishery in respect to the protection it affords. There is no point which regards our national wealth or national safety, in respect to which it seems practicable to do so much with so little.

We rely on the evidence before you, that the public will not sustain the charge of a dollar. Those ought not to doubt the evidence who cannot invalidate it. If then the fishermen ask you to restore only their own money, will you deny them? Will you return to every other person exporting dutied goods the money he has paid, and will you refuse the poor fisherman?

If there must be an instance of the kind, will you single out for this oppressive partiality, that branch which is described by the Secretary of State as too poor even to bear its own part of the common burden? That branch which nevertheless has borne the neglect of our nation, and the persecution of foreign prohibitions and duties. A branch which, though we have received much and expect more, both of money and services, urges no claims but such as common justice has sanctioned.

Mr. GERRY having moved to strike out the words "bounty allowed" in order to insert allowance made, by way of accommodation,

Mr. MURRAY observed, that the question was, whether a bounty should be given for the encouragement of the fishery: the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GERRay] did not alter the principle—it was still “the old cocked hat” on the one hand, and on the other, “the cocked old hat.” The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Fitzsimons] had asserted, that Congress have a right to alter the drawbacks, and allow them in any other mode, by which the citizens may receive back their own money; but this is not a case of that nature; for the bill says, “in case the moneys appropriated (for the payment of the duties) shall be inadequate, the deficiency shall be supplied from the Treasury;” here the Treasury is pledged for the payment of the bounties; and the question is, not on the principle of changing the drawback, but the giving encouragement to a particular branch, at the expense of the community at large.

Mr. BARNWELL observed, that those who are best acquainted with the fisheries, look on the proposed mode of encouragement as the best; and that they ought to be allowed to use the gifts of the public in the most advantageous manner: that, if he himself were concerned in the cultivation of any particular commodity, for the encouragement of which a sum were granted, he would be much surprised to meet a refusal, in case he should come forward, and propose some more effectual mode of applying that grant: that even if the bounties should happen to exceed the drawbacks, by eight or ten thousand dollars, the number of seamen to be maintained would be well worth that sum: that whenever the two Houses of Congress and the President of the United States are of opinion that the general welfare will be promoted by raising any sum of money, they have undoubted right to raise it, provided that the taxes be uniform; that although it may not at present be an object of great consequence to America to become a maritime power, yet it is of some importance to have constantly at hand a nursery of seamen, to furnish our merchants with the means of transporting their commodities across the sea; that whatever allowance or bounty is granted upon any particular commodity, must ever be paid by the whole, for the advantage of a part, whether it be upon cotton to the Southward, upon fish to the Eastward, or upon other commodities to the middle States; that, if the people cannot have so much confidence in their Representatives, as to trust them with the power of granting bounties, the Government must be a very paltry one indeed. The object of the bill was only to allow to the fishermen, in the manner that would be most beneficial to them, the same sum, that would otherwise be allowed. If, however, from time and experience, it should appear that this bounty proved an imposition on Government, he would not hesitate to revoke it.

Mr. GERRY.—The State of Massachusetts asks nothing more than equal justice. We do not come forward to request favors from the United States; we only wish that the same system which is applied to other parts of the Union, may be applied to us. But, in examining this question, we wish that gentlemen would not make distinctions which will not admit of a difference.

The proposed allowance has been called a bounty on occupation, and is said to be very different from that encouragement, which is the incidental result of a general commercial system; but in reality it is no bounty: a bounty is a grant, made without any consideration whatever, as an equivalent; and I have no idea of a bounty, which admits of receiving from the person, on whom it is conferred, the amount of what is granted. We have imposed a duty on salt, and thereby draw a certain sum of money from the fishermen: the drawback is, in all instances, the amount of the money received; this is all we ask; and we ask it for a set of men who are as well entitled to the regard of Government as any other class of citizens.

It has been supposed, that the allowance, made to the fishermen, will amount to a greater sum than the drawback on the exportation of the fish; but I think it has been clearly shown that this will not be the case: on the contrary, it is presumable, that the drawback on the fish would on the whole exceed the sum which is proposed to be allowed to the fishermen; sometimes it might be more, sometimes less. The calculation is made on general principles; and it is impossible to calculate to a single cent: the quantity of salt to be expended on the fish, cannot be minutely ascertained; but this was not heretofore considered as a sufficient reason why Congress should refuse to allow the drawback; they allowed it, though in a different shape. It is now proposed to make a further commutation: gentlemen call this a bounty on occupation; but is there any proposition made for paying to the fishermen, or other persons concerned in the fishery, any sums which we have not previously received from them? If this were the case, it would indeed be a bounty; but if we beforehand receive from them as much as the allowance amounts to, there is no bounty granted at all.

If, however, it really was a bounty on occupation, it would after all be only an indulgence similar to what has been granted to the landed and agricultural interest. We have laid on hemp a duty of fifty four cents per hundred weight; and on beer, ale, and porter, five cents per gallon. Now, I ask gentlemen, whether the professed design of those duties was to raise a revenue, or to prevent the importation of those articles? they were laid for no other purpose, than to prevent foreigners from importing them, and thereby to encourage our own manufactures; and was not that encouragement a bounty to the persons concerned in producing such articles in this country? If the duties had not been laid, the importer could sell much cheaper than he now can; and the landed interest would be under a necessity of selling cheaper in proportion. If those prohibitory duties operate as a bounty in favor of raising hemp, and of brewing beer, ale, and porter, I ask, whether, if a bounty were proposed on every quintal of fish, it might not, with the same propriety, be granted? If we have not a right to grant a bounty in the one case, we have as little right to grant it in the other.

A calculation has been offered to show that the proposed allowance will exceed the amount of the present drawbacks, by ten thousand dollars a year; but that calculation has been proved to be erroneous. Suppose, however, that this was the fact, what comparison is there between such a tax on the citizens of the United States, and the tax borne by the citizens of Massachusetts, for the defence of the Western frontier? A commercial war is waged against the American fisheries, by foreign nations, who lay heavy duties on the American fish, and apply the produce of those duties in bounties to their own fishermen; and their fisheries being less extensive than ours, the duty thus imposed on our fish, and bestowed in bounties to their vessels, operate in a two-fold proportion to the discouragement of our fishermen, and the encouragement of theirs.

I wish to know on what principle gentlemen can expect, that the citizens of Massachusetts should contribute two hundred thousand dollars, or perhaps a greater sum, for the protection of the Western frontier against the Indians, when no contribution is made to support the commerce of Massachusetts, which, without this support, will be as effectually ruined, as if their vessels were captured by an enemy. The principle is carried farther with respect to the protection of the frontier: we have voted large sums as presents to the savages, to keep them friends to the Frontier settlers: there is, however, no clause in the Constitution that will authorize a measure of this kind: it is true, indeed, we have a power to regulate trade and commerce with the Indian tribes; but does that give us a power to render the United States tributary to the savages? and if we make them such grants every year, do we not in fact become tributary to them?

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] says, that although this plan of encouraging the fisheries may be wise policy in Britain, as being on all sides surrounded by the sea, yet the United States will not equally find their account in pursuing the same plan. The State of Virginia is, in point of exposure from the sea, very differently circumstanced from the State of Massachusetts: we have a vast extent of country, four hundred and fifty miles along the coast, exposed: the citizens of all the towns along the coast are obliged to pursue marine occupations; and I hope the gentleman does not wish that the country should be depopulated, and the inhabitants driven off to settle the Western territory.

The State of Virginia is very happily circumstanced with respect to a marine war: should such an event take place, that State is pretty secure from depredations; but when we consider how much the inhabitants of Massachusetts are exposed in a case of that kind, we ought to look forward, and make some provision for their defence: they have as good a right to expect that Government will make some arrangements for their protection, as that they shall be obliged to contribute for the defence of the Western frontier.

But their commerce, it seems, must not be supported! Taxes however must be laid: and those taxes applied to encourage the farmer, and to bribe the Indians into peace! Is this fair? Is this pursuing a liberal system of politics? Will this reconcile the minds of our people to the General Government? If so reasonable a proposition be neglected by the House, it will convince the citizens of that State, that it is the object of Government to destroy their commerce, and to make them entirely dependent on the agricultural interest.

Here Mr. GERRY read a statement, to show the diminution of the revenue in consequence of the failure of the fisheries; and added,

To support the fishery, is to support the revenue: by that staple, the citizens of Massachusetts are enabled to pay the revenue that is expected from them: and, by an attempt to save ten thousand dollars, Government will probably sacrifice a hundred thousand; and besides, lose the confidence of the citizens of that State.

The only question now is, whether this be a direct bounty, or simply a commutation of the allowance already granted by Congress? If the latter be the case, I can see no reason why we should refuse our assent to a proposition, which is only calculated to do justice to the people concerned, and to give encouragement to a very important branch in the United States; especially as the proposition will even have a tendency to increase the revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMSON.—It has been urged with great propriety, in favor of the bill now submitted to our consideration, that the operation of our laws should in all cases tend to encourage useful industry; that while we are giving back the duties on all other foreign goods which are exported, it would be unjust and cruel to refuse a full drawback of the duties on salt which may be exported, especially when the circumstances of its exportation are attended with an increase of riches and strength to the nation. Impressed as I am with the force of these arguments, and desirous as I am to protect and encourage the native seamen of America, by all prudent, practicable, and constitutional means, I shall nevertheless find it my duty to vote for striking out the first section of the bill, because it proposes to give a bounty for the encouragement of the vessels employed in the fisheries.

We have been told that the name is improper; that it is simply a drawback of the duty upon salt; and gentlemen have produced a very ingenious calculation, by which they attempt to prove, that in some years it may happen that the whole duty on the salt will not be repaid; but they admit that in some years the drawback or bounty will exceed the duty. It is certainly their opinion—and in this we are perfectly agreed—that the money to be paid will be more than that received, else there had been no use for so large an appropriation. We shall not trouble the Committee with calculations on this subject. It is conceded, that the encouragement to be given, probably will exceed the full drawback of the duty on salt. In other words, a douceur or a proper bounty is to be given: let us call it one thousand dollars per annum. Is it within the powers of this Congress to grant bounties? I think not; and on this single position I would rest the argument.

In the Constitution of this Government there are two or three remarkable provisions, which seem to be in point. It is provided, that direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. It is also provided, that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States; and it is provided, that no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another. The clear and obvious intention of the articles mentioned was, that Congress might not have the power of imposing unequal burdens; that it might not be in their power to gratify one part of the Union by oppressing another. It appeared possible, and not very improbable, that the time might come, when, by greater cohesion, by more unanimity, by more address, the Representatives of one part of the Union might attempt to impose unequal taxes, or to relieve their constituents at the expense of other people. To prevent the possibility of such a combination, the articles that I have mentioned were inserted in the Constitution. Suppose a poll-tax should be attempted; suppose it should be enacted that every poll in the Eastern States shall pay a tax of half a dollar, and every poll in the Southern States should pay a tax of one dollar. Do you think we should pay the tax? No, certainly. We should plead the Constitution, and tell you that the law was impotent and void.

But we have been told, that Congress may give bounties for useful purposes; that is to say, they may give bounties for all imaginable purposes; because the same majority that votes the bounty will not fail to call the purpose a good one. Establish the doctrine of bounties, and let us see what may follow. Uniform taxes are laid to raise money, and that money is distributed—not uniformly; the whole of it may be given to the people in one end of the Union. Could we say, in such a case, that the tax had been uniform? I think not. There is certainly a majority in this House who think that the nation would be stronger and more independent, if all our labor was performed by free men. This object might be promoted by a bounty. Let a poll-tax be laid, according to the Constitution, of one dollar per poll: in this case, sixty cents must be paid for each slave; and the number of slaves being 680,166, their tax would amount to $334,911. To encourage the labor of citizens, let Congress then give an annual bounty of one dollar to every free man who is a mechanic, or who labors in the field. We might be told that the bounty was small, and the object was good; but the measure would be most oppressive, for it would be a clear tax of rather more than three hundred thousand dollars on the Southern States.

Perhaps the case I have put is too strong—Congress can never do a thing that is so palpably unjust—but this, sir, is the very mark at which the theory of bounties seems to point. The certain operation of that measure is the oppression of the Southern States, by superior numbers in the Northern interest. This was to be feared at the formation of this Government, and you find many articles in the Constitution, besides those I have quoted, which were certainly intended to guard us against the dangerous bias of interest, and the power of numbers. Wherefore was it provided that no duty should be laid on exports? Was it not to defend the great staples of the Southern States—tobacco, rice, and indigo—from the operation of unequal regulations of commerce, or unequal indirect taxes, as another article had defended us from unequal direct taxes?

I do not hazard much in saying, that the present Constitution had never been adopted without those preliminary guards in it. Establish the general doctrine of bounties, and all the provisions I have mentioned become useless. They vanish into air, and like the baseless fabric of a vision, leave not a trace behind. The common defence and general welfare, in the hands of a good politician, may supersede every part of our Constitution, and leave us in the hands of time and chance. Manufactures, in general, are useful to the nation; they promote the public good and general welfare. How many of them are springing up in the Northern States? Let them be properly supported by bounties, and you will find no occasion for unequal taxes. The tax may be equal in the beginning—it will be sufficiently unequal in the end.

We are told, that a nursery of seamen may be of great use to the nation, and the bounty proposed is a very small one. These, sir, are the reasons why I have marked this as a dangerous bill; the most dangerous innovations are made under these circumstances. To begin with a great bounty would be imprudent, and to give a small bounty for a doubtful purpose, might deserve a worse epithet. Half a million of dollars per annum would have been too much for a beginning, and perhaps a bounty on the use of sleighs, though they are convenient for traveling in winter; or a bounty on stone fences, though they are durable, would not at this time be prudent. The object of the bounty, and the amount of it, are equally to be disregarded in the present case; we are simply to consider whether bounties may safely be given under the present Constitution. For myself, I would rather begin with a bounty of one million per annum than one thousand. I wish that my constituents may know whether they are to put any confidence in that paper called the Constitution.

You will suffer me to say, that the Southern States have much to fear from the progress of this Government, unless your strength is governed by prudence. The operation of the funding system has translated at least two millions of dollars from the Southern States, that is to say, from Georgia, the Carolinas, and Virginia, to the Northern States. The interest of that sum, when it shall be six per cent, will be $120,000; but the quota of those States is at least one-third of the whole; whence it follows, that they must pay forty thousand dollars every year, in the form of interest to the Northern States. This, it seems, is not sufficient, and other measures are to be adopted for draining the Southern States. Bounties to promote the general welfare are already brought forward. We shall not hear of a bounty for raising rice, or preparing naval stores. If that was the question, the general welfare would not have such prominent features. Unless the Southern States are protected by the Constitution, their valuable staples, and their visionary wealth, must occasion their destruction. Three short years has this Government existed—it is not three years—but we have already given serious alarms to many of our fellow-citizens. Establish the doctrine of bounties, set aside that part of the Constitution which requires equal taxes and demands similar distributions, destroy this barrier, and it is not a few fishermen that will enter, claiming ten or twelve thousand dollars, but all manner of persons—people of every trade and occupation—may enter at the breach, until they have eaten up the bread of our children.

Perhaps I have viewed this project in too serious a light; but if I am particularly solicitous, on the subject of finance, that we do not even seem to depart from the spirit of the Constitution, it is because I wish that the Union may be perpetual. The several States are now pretty well relieved from their debts, and our fellow-citizens in the Southern States have very little interest in the national funds; press them a little with unequal taxes, and the remedy is plain.

While I would shun bounties, as leading to dangerous measures, I am not inattentive to every argument that has been advanced by the honorable member who first rose in defence of the bill. That gentleman tells us, that more than a bushel of salt is used in curing a quintal of fish. If this fact be established, the former act should be amended, by giving a greater drawback. He says the drawback, as it is now paid to the merchant, does not operate so as to encourage the seamen, who have most need of such assistance. This is very probable, and the parties may be relieved by dividing the drawback in the very manner that is proposed by the bill. If it is true that the proposed bounties will not exceed the average of the drawback that should be paid on salt, why do they contend about names, unless they are solicitous about the precedent? If our object is to encourage industry, and to increase our commerce, by sending fish to a foreign market, we must adhere to the drawback; for, according to the terms of the bill, the bounty is to be paid, though every fish that is caught should be consumed in the country; in which case we should be paying a visionary drawback, when nothing was exported. According to the terms of the bill, there is no proportion between the labor and the reward, so far as the bank fishery is concerned; the bounty in all cases being the same.

Having exercised your patience in objecting to this new system of bounties, and having hinted on some objections to the general operations of the bill, so far as industry and enterprise may be desired, I shall, in a few words, submit the outline of a plan that seems to comprehend all the useful parts of the bill, without any speculation upon bounties.

If the drawback on dried fish exported, is not equal to the duty on the salt used in curing such fish, let the drawback be increased to eleven cents or twelve cents, as the case may be. Let us suppose that the drawback for the next year will be equal to the drawback on the last year; and let that sum of money, being the expected drawback, be divided between the seamen and owners, according to the terms of the bill. The accounts must be made up annually. If the drawback exceeds the allowance that had been made, the difference will be considered as advanced to the fishery, and the allowance for the next year must be somewhat reduced, according to the actual amount of the drawback. If the fishermen are more fortunate or more active, and the exports are increased, the allowance for the next year must be raised. The rule being fixed by law, all that remains, being pure calculation, may be done from year to year by the Executive. Every important object of this bill, that has been presented to our view, may be obtained by safe and constitutional steps. Why should a man take a dangerous and a doubtful path, when a safe one presents itself? If nothing more is desired than to regulate and protect the fishery, the bill may be altered and accommodated to that purpose. If the theory of bounties is to be established, by which the Southern States must suffer while others gain, the bill informs us what we are to expect.

The Committee now rose, without taking any question.

MONDAY, February 6.

A member from Maryland, to wit: JOHN FRANCIS MERCER, returned to serve in the room of WILLIAM PINKNEY, resigned, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A petition of the tanners of the town of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences they suffer from the erection of mills for the purpose of grinding tanners' bark for exportation, and praying that Congress will adopt such measures for their relief as may appear just and right. Ordered to lie on the table.

THE COD FISHERIES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the encouragement of the Bank and other Cod-Fisheries, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein."

Mr. GOODHUE.—The gentleman last up [Mr. WILLIAMSON] says, that an appropriation of money being made by the bill now before us, and the Treasury standing pledged for the payment, therefore a direct bounty is granted. At present, we pay in drawbacks about $45,000; but we cannot say that this sum will be adequate to the payment of the drawbacks next year; for, if a greater quantity of fish be taken, a greater sum, of course, must be allowed; and, as the sum depends entirely on the quantity of fish, it is impossible to ascertain beforehand the precise amount. There is not, however, in the whole bill, anything of a bounty, except the bare name. The gentleman allows that we may commute the present drawbacks, and give them to the fisherman instead of the merchant; but it is impossible to do this with safety in any other mode than that pointed out in the bill. Shall we leave it to the fisherman, to be determined by his oath? This would not be advisable.

The plan proposed is a much less exceptionable one. It is founded on a calculation that a certain quantity of tonnage is employed in taking a certain quantity of fish. On this calculation the allowance is apportioned to the tonnage. If gentlemen think the allowance too high, let the sum be reduced; but let it not be stigmatized as a bounty. It is no such thing. The word "bounty" is an unfortunate expression, and I wish it were entirely out of the bill.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—The bill now under consideration has two important objects in view. The one is, to give encouragement to our fishermen, and, by that encouragement, to increase their numbers; the other is to govern those fishermen by certain laws, by which they will be kept under due restraint. Both these objects are of great importance to such persons as choose to employ their capitals in the fishery business. And I believe it will not be disputed that the business itself is of considerable importance to the United States, inasmuch as it affords a certain proportion of remittance or exportation to foreign countries, and does not impoverish the country, but enriches it by the addition of so much wealth drawn from the sea.

It is the object of those gentlemen who favor the bill that the fishermen should have some encouragement, not given to them at the expense of the United States, but directed to them out of what was in the former law, called a drawback of the duty on salt. The calculation, as I understand it, has been made as nearly as possible to give that drawback, not to the merchants who export the fish, but to the fishermen who take it, in order to increase that description of men, without whose assistance it is vain to expect any benefit from the fisheries; for, if the merchants at present engaged in that branch possessed the whole capital of the United States, yet, if they cannot get fishermen, they cannot carry on the fishery. This is done by a particular class of men, who must be not only expert seamen, but also accustomed to taking the fish and curing it. If these men cannot be had, the capital cannot be employed, and those who undertake the business cannot carry it on, or reap any profit from it.

Whilst the drawback is payable only to the merchant who exports the fish, it is impossible to convince the fishermen that they reap from it any advantage whatever; or, if the more discerning among them do perceive any advantage in it, the others who are not so clear-sighted cannot discern it, and are therefore not disposed to undertake the business. It is, however, of considerable importance to the merchants that the fisherman should receive a proper encouragement, even if they were obliged to allow him a bounty out of their own pocket.

The government of the fishermen, after their engagement in this business, is also necessary to be provided for; otherwise, frequent instances may occur among that class of men of quitting one vessel to embark on board another, or of shipping themselves for a foreign voyage, before the expiration of the fishing season. In the latter case, the vessel lies useless on the owner's hands, and he, together with the whole expense of the outfit, loses all his prospects of future gain.

The two objects here mentioned are fully provided for in the bill. Still, however, it is objected to. But what is the objection? It is, that the word "bounty" is twice used in this clause. Let us now see what advantage will result from striking out this obnoxious "bounty." None at all. The bill says it shall cease; and have gentlemen any objection to the bounty's ceasing? Since the bounty is to cease by this bill, what advantage in striking it out? The sense would still remain the same; and I do not know why we should make a law expressly to strike out the word "bounty," but to strike out the bounty itself.

It is strange to me that any gentleman, whether he is giving a great bounty or no bounty at all, should quarrel with this unfortunate word. There is, indeed, one part of the section which I will readily consent to strike out, and I believe every other gentleman who is in favor of the bill will consent to it likewise; and that is the clause which provides that the bounty to be allowed and paid on every vessel, for one season, shall not exceed one hundred and seventy dollars. If, when the vote is taken on the section, there does not appear a majority of the House in favor of striking out the whole, we may then move for striking out the proviso, if it be offensive to any gentleman. If it be not offensive, it may remain.

If gentlemen are disputing only because the word "bounty" is in the bill, they may be perfectly relieved from their uneasiness on that score; for the bill expressly says, "that the bounty now allowed upon the exportation of dried fish of the fisheries of the United States shall cease, and, in lieu thereof," a different kind of encouragement is to be given. Here is no reason to dispute about a word. If gentlemen are disposed to consent to the principle of the bill, that the drawback of the duties on salt shall be commuted for a certain sum, to encourage the fishermen, they will vote in favor of the bill; if not, they will vote against it. But it is impossible for me to conceive why any gentleman under Heaven should be against it. It is only fixing, for the merchants engaged in this branch, a clear and equitable ratio for distributing among the fishermen that encouragement which they think necessary in order to attach those people to the business, and to prevent them from going to other occupations on land. The bill is an important one, and will increase that branch of business, which is very useful to the community. It does not lay a farthing of bounty or duty on any other persons than those who are immediately concerned in it. It will serve them, and will not injure anybody.

Mr. LAURANCE said, from examining the section, he conceived it contemplated no more than what the merchant is entitled to by existing laws. The merchant is now entitled to the drawback; but it is found by experience that the effect has not been to produce that encouragement to the fishermen which was expected; and he presumed the way was perfectly clear to give a new direction to the drawback, and this is all that is aimed at in the bill. He supposed that the clause had no necessary connexion with the question which had been started respecting the right of the Government to grant bounties; but, since the question has been brought forward, it may be proper to consider it. In discussing the question, he inquired, What has Congress already done? Have we not laid extra duties on various articles, expressly for the purpose of encouraging various branches of our own manufactures? These duties are bounties to all intents and purposes, and are founded on the idea only of their conducing to the general interest. Similar objections to those now advanced were not made to these duties. They were advocated, some of them, by gentlemen from the Southward. He traced the effects of these duties, and showed that they operated fully as indirect bounties.

Mr. L. then adverted particularly to the Constitution, and observed that it contains general principles and powers only. These powers depend on particular laws for their operation; and on this idea, he contended that the powers of the Government must, in various circumstances, extend to the granting bounties. He instanced, in case of a war with a foreign Power, will any gentleman say that the General Government has not a power to grant a bounty on arms, ammunition, &c., should the general welfare require it? The general welfare is inseparably connected with any object or pursuit which in its effects adds to the riches of the country. He conceived that the argument was given up by gentlemen in opposition to the bill, when they admit of encouragement to the fishermen in any possible modification of it. He then adverted particularly to the fisheries, stated the number of men employed, the tons of shipping necessary to export the fish taken, and inferred the sound policy of encouraging so important a branch of business.

Gentlemen say that we do not want a navy. Grant it; but can they say that we shall never have a war with any European Power? May not the time arrive when the protection to the commerce of this country, derived from this source, may be of the utmost necessity to its existence? Adverting to Mr. WILLIAMSON's objection from the unequal operation of bounties, and who had referred to the article of the Constitution which says that taxes shall be equal in all the States, Mr. L. observed, that this article in the Constitution could only respect the rates of the duties, and that the same duties should be paid in Virginia that are paid in New York—at the Northward as at the Southward. It surely could not mean that every individual should pay exactly the same sum in every part of the Union. This was a provision that no law could possibly contemplate.

He concluded by a summary recapitulation of his arguments, and saying he hoped the section would be retained.

Mr. MADISON.—In the conflict I feel between my disposition on one hand to afford every constitutional encouragement to the fisheries, and my dislike on the other, of the consequences apprehended from some clauses of the bill, I should have forborne to enter into this discussion, if I had not found, that over and above such arguments as appear to be natural and pertinent to the subject, others have been introduced which are, in my judgment, contrary to the true meaning, and even strike at the characteristic principles of the existing Constitution. Let me premise, however, to the remarks which I shall briefly offer, on the doctrine maintained by these gentlemen, that I make a material distinction in the present case, between an allowance as a mere commutation and modification of a drawback, and an allowance in the nature of a real and positive bounty. I make a distinction also, as a subject of fair consideration at least, between a bounty granted under the particular terms in the Constitution, "a power to regulate trade," and one granted under the indefinite terms which have been cited as authority on this occasion. I think, however, that the term "bounty," is in every point of view improper as it is here applied, not only because it may be offensive to some, and in the opinion of others carries a dangerous implication, but also because it does not express the true intention of the bill, as avowed and advocated by its patrons themselves. For if, in the allowance, nothing more is proposed than a mere reimbursement of the sum advanced, it is only paying a debt; and when we pay a debt, we ought not to claim the merit of granting a bounty.

It is supposed by some gentlemen, that Congress have authority not only to grant bounties in the sense here used, merely as a commutation for drawbacks, but even to grant them under a power by virtue of which they may do anything which they may think conducive to the "general welfare." This, sir, in my mind, raises the important and fundamental question, whether the general terms which had been cited, are to be considered as a sort of capion or general description of the specified powers, and as having no further meaning, and giving no further power than what is found in that specification; or as an abstract and indefinite delegation of power extending to all cases whatever; to all such, at least, as will admit the application of money, which is giving as much latitude as any Government could well desire.

I, sir, have always conceived—I believe those who proposed the Constitution conceived, and it is still more fully known, and more material to observe that those who ratified the Constitution conceived—that this is not an indefinite Government, deriving its powers from the general terms prefixed to the specified powers, but a limited Government, tied down to the specified powers which explain and define the general terms. The gentlemen who contend for a contrary doctrine are surely not aware of the consequences which flow from it, and which they must either admit or give up their doctrine.

It will follow, in the first place, that if the terms be taken in the broad sense they maintain, the particular powers afterwards so carefully and distinctly enumerated would be without any meaning, and must go for nothing. It would be absurd to say, first, that Congress may do what they please, and then that they may do this or that particular thing; after giving Congress power to raise money, and apply it to all purposes which they may pronounce necessary to the general welfare, it would be absurd; to say the least, to superadd a power to raise armies, to provide fleets, &c. In fact, the meaning of the general terms in question must either be sought in the subsequent enumeration which limits and details them, or they convert the Government from one limited, as hitherto supposed, to the enumerated powers, into a Government without any limits at all.

It is to be recollected, that the terms "common defence and general welfare," as here used, are not novel terms, first introduced into this Constitution. They are terms familiar in their construction, and well known to the people of America. They are repeatedly found in the old Articles of Confederation, where, although they are susceptible of as great latitude as can be given them by the context here, it was never supposed or pretended that they conveyed any such power as is now assigned to them. On the contrary, it was always considered as clear and certain, that the old Congress was limited to the enumerated powers, and that the enumeration limited and explained the general terms. I ask the gentlemen themselves, whether it ever was supposed or suspected that the old Congress could give away the moneys of the States in bounties, to encourage agriculture, or for any other purpose they pleased? If such a power had been possessed by that body, it would have been much less impotent, or have borne a very different character from that universally ascribed to it.

The novel idea now annexed to these terms, and never before entertained by the friends or enemies of the Government, will have a further consequence, which cannot have been taken into the view of the gentlemen. Their construction would not only give Congress the complete Legislative power I have stated—it would do more—it would supercede all the restrictions understood at present to lie on their power with respect to the Judiciary. It would put it in the power of Congress to establish courts throughout the United States, with cognizance of suits between citizen and citizen, and in all cases whatsoever. This, sir, seems to be demonstrable; for if the clause in question really authorizes Congress to do whatever they think fit, provided it be for the general welfare, of which they are to judge, and money can be applied to it, Congress must have power to create and support a Judiciary Establishment, with a jurisdiction extending to all cases favorable, in their opinion, to the general welfare, in the same manner as they have power to pass laws and apply money, providing in any other way for the general welfare. I shall be reminded, perhaps, that according to the terms of the Constitution, the Judicial Power is to extend to certain cases only, not to all cases. But this circumstance can have no effect in the argument, it being presupposed by the gentlemen that the specification of certain objects does not limit the import of general terms. Taking these terms as an abstract and indefinite grant of power, they comprise all the objects of Legislative regulation, as well as such as fall under the Judiciary article in the Constitution, as those falling immediately under the Legislative article; and if the partial enumeration of objects in the Legislative article does not, as these gentlemen contend, limit the general power, neither will it be limited by the partial enumeration of objects in the Judiciary article.

There are consequences, sir, still more extensive, which, as they follow clearly from the doctrine combated, must either be admitted, or the doctrine must be given up. If Congress can apply money indefinitely to the general welfare, and are the sole and supreme judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may establish teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of the public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may undertake the regulation of all roads, other than post roads. In short, everything, from the highest object of State legislation, down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress; for every object I have mentioned would admit the application of money, and might be called, if Congress pleased, provisions for the general welfare.

The language held in various discussions of this House, is a proof that the doctrine in question was never entertained by this body. Arguments, wherever the subject would permit, have constantly been drawn from the peculiar nature of this Government, as limited to certain enumerated powers, instead of extending, like other Governments, to all cases not particularly excepted. In a very late instance—I mean the debate on the Representation bill—it must be remembered, that an argument much urged, particularly by a gentleman from Massachusetts, against the ratio of one for thirty thousand, was, that this Government was unlike the State Governments, which had an indefinite variety of objects within their power; that it had a small number of objects only to attend to, and therefore that a smaller number of Representatives would be sufficient to administer it.

Several arguments have been advanced to show, that because, in the regulation of trade, indirect and eventual encouragement is given to manufactures, therefore Congress have power to give money in direct bounties, or to grant it in any other way that would answer the same purpose. But surely, sir, there is a great and obvious difference, which it cannot be necessary to enlarge upon. A duty laid on imported implements of husbandry, would, in its operation, be an indirect tax on exported produce; but will any one say, that by virtue of a mere power to lay duties on imports, Congress might go directly to the produce or implements of agriculture, or to the articles exported? It is true, duties on exports are expressly prohibited; but if there were no article forbidding them, a power directly to tax exports could never be deduced from a power to tax imports, although such a power might directly and incidentally affect exports.

In short, sir, without going further into the subject, which I should not have here touched on at all but for the reasons already mentioned, I venture to declare it as my opinion, that were the power of Congress to be established in the latitude contended for, it would subvert the very foundation, and transmute the very nature of the limited Government established by the people of America; and what inferences might be drawn, or what consequences ensue from such a step, it is incumbent on us all well to consider.

With respect to the question before the House, for striking out the clause, it is immaterial whether it be struck out, or so amended as to rest on the avowed principle of a commutation for the drawback; but as a clause has been drawn up by my colleague, in order to be substituted, I shall concur in a vote for striking out, reserving to myself a freedom to be governed in my final vote by the modification which may prevail.

Mr. BOURNE, of Massachusetts—

Mr. Chairman: I think little can be added after so full a discussion of the subject before you. The object of the first section in this bill is intended for the relief of the fishermen and their owners. They complain that the law now in force was meant for their benefit, by granting a drawback on the fish exported; this they find by experience is not the case, for they say, that neither the fishermen who catch the fish, nor the importer of the salt, receive the drawback; and I rather suppose, sir, it is the case. The owners of the greater part of the fishing vessels are not merchants, neither do they import the salt they consume; but when the fish they take are cured for market, they are sold at the market price; and it frequently happens that those persons who purchase the fish are not the exporters of them, or the importers of the salt, but a third person, who purchases with a prospect of selling them at a profit, is the exporter; and when it so happens, neither the fisherman who catches the fish nor the importer of the salt, receive any benefit from the drawback, unless the purchaser (the third person) give a greater price in contemplation of the drawback, which I think is not to be supposed.

Is it worthy the attention of Government that the cod fishery should be preserved? It appears to me that it is. When we consider the labor and assiduity bestowed on this object by our Ministers, at the settlement of peace between us and Great Britain, and the care then taken to secure this privilege, as appears by the treaty—[here Mr. B. read that part of the treaty which secures to us the fishery, he then proceeded]—and consider the struggle made to deprive us of this inestimable branch of commerce, I cannot suppose that any one would, at this day, voluntarily relinquish it, and suffer Great Britain to monopolize this branch, and supply the Mediterranean, French, and other markets. Great Britain, at present, enjoys a sufficient portion of this commerce, while France is confined to the narrow limits of St. Peters and Miquelon. If we relinquish this branch of the cod fishery, what is left us? Our whale fishery is nearly at an end, and unless Government speedily interpose, by granting relief, we shall totally lose it. Does not the British Government wish to deprive us of this branch also? Have not letters or agents been sent to the island of Nantucket, as well as New Bedford, where this branch of business is principally prosecuted, inviting the whale fishermen to remove, and offering them permanent settlements at Milford-Haven, at the expense of their Government? This must be viewed as a great encouragement, in addition to their bounties on oil, to a class of poor men employed in that business. If the cod fishery is relinquished, the fishermen have only to remove to the opposite shore of Nova Scotia, where they will find encouragement fully adequate to their services—of all which they are not unapprised. By encouraging this class of men, your revenue will be increased; for in return for the fish exported, you will receive sugar, coffee, cocoa, indigo, molasses, pimento, cotton, dye-woods, rum, wine, salt, fruit, and other articles subject to duty, and consumed in the country. And again, your Treasury will receive an excess by the provision in this bill; for I presume the greater proportion of vessels employed in this business are from twenty to forty tons; the town of Marblehead, perhaps, has principally large ones. Suppose, then, a vessel of thirty tons obtains, in a season, six hundred quintals of fish? (a very moderate voyage indeed,) her tonnage is seventy-five dollars; the drawback on exportation would be seventy-eight dollars; so that your Treasury retains three dollars gain by this bill, which would be a loss on the drawback.

Mr. Chairman, I think, upon the whole, that by granting the encouragement to the fishermen and their owners, held out in the bill, would prove very beneficial to the United States, I hope therefore, the section before you will not be struck out.

At this point, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 7.

Ordered, That the petitions of the tanners of the town of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, which was presented yesterday, be referred to Mr. BOURDINOT, Mr. WHITE, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, and Mr. NILES; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for an apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the third day of March, 1797; which was received and read the first time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report stating the amount of the subscriptions to the loans proposed by the act making provision for the public debt, as well in the debts of the respective States as in the domestic debt of the United States, and of the parts which remain unsubscribed, together with such measures as are, in his opinion, expedient to be taken on the subject, pursuant to an order of this House of the 1st of November last; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE FISHERY BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for the encouragement of the Bank and other Cod Fisheries, and for the regulation and Government of the fishermen employed therein."

Mr. PARR said no man in this House was more heartily disposed to encourage the fisheries of the United States than he was; nor could any one more sincerely wish to encourage the bold, active, and enterprising adventurers in that branch of our commerce to persevere in it, than he did; being sensible of the importance of their traffic in peace, and of their defence of their country and annoyance of their enemies in war. But, sir, (said Mr. P.) I much doubt whether Congress can give that encouragement to the fisheries to which they are entitled, and which policy would lead the General Government to give, were it not restricted by the Constitution. I consider, sir, the Constitution as intended to remedy the defects of the Confederation to a certain degree; so far only as would secure the independence and general welfare of the Confederate States, without endangering the sovereignty and independence of the individual States. Congress, therefore, was authorized to pay the debts of the Union, and to regulate commerce, partly for that purpose, and partly to prevent improper and dangerous commercial combinations, jealousies, and alterations between the States. But Congress was not intrusted with any regulation of exports which could admit of an interposition which might be dictated by partiality; nor was Congress permitted to lay any tax which could by any possibility operate unequally on the States in general. It is said, indeed, that if a drawback be not allowed on the salt used in salting fish, there will be, in fact, a duty on the exportation of the fish. But to this I think it may be replied, that the Constitution guards the exports of each State against the possibility of a partial restriction by Congress, or even by the States themselves; that Congress cannot lay a duty on the exportation of rice, indigo, tobacco, &c., or any other article exported from any State, because this might be done to the injury of the State where such duty would operate, and to the advantage and aggrandizement of some particular States, its competitors more favored by the General Government, or possessing more influence in the debates of Congress; and that the States are also individually restrained from laying such duties without the consent of Congress, to prevent acts which might produce jealousies, commercial combinations, and, perhaps, at length, civil dissensions. That this restriction, if it be intended to prevent partiality, therefore, cannot extend to authorize drawbacks, which may be productive of partial preferences and their consequent jealousies; that, if drawbacks be granted at all, they ought to be universally extended to every article which is or can be exported from any of the States, having in its composition a dutiable ingredient; that hence, ships and other vessels, &c., should have drawbacks on the sails, cordage, iron, &c.; but it may also be said that, as to the duty on salt, that is amply repaid to the merchant by the price annexed to his fish: the sums laid out in salt and fish together form a capital on which he takes care to have a sufficient profit. Those merchants employed in this traffic, if allowed a drawback, would have a preference to other merchants, who import largely, pay heavy duties, and have no other advantage than the usual advance on their goods. The exporter of any article, with a drawback, must have an advantage over his fellow-citizens, who purchase through necessity many dutiable articles, and are obliged to consume them, without any other benefit than the use of them. I mention this because it has been said [by Mr. AMES] that, having made the men of Marblehead pay for salt, they have a right to demand the money expended in that salt on the exportation of their fish; for it would be as reasonable for the man who had his fish on which his salt was expended, or who had used any other article for which he had paid a duty, to claim of Congress a return of his money expended therein, as the exporter of fish. The only difference is, that, if both were paid the exact sum so expended by them, the exporter of fish would get twice paid. The purchaser or consumer of his fish would pay him for his salt therein, as if it were substantial fish, and the State for it as mere salt. Here, then, is a field for partiality, discontent, and complaints, which the Constitution wisely guards against. It cannot, therefore, be to any purpose to tell us that a bounty, or allowance, as it is now called, is preferable to a drawback, as there is not so great room for fraud in the one as the other; nor can it be of importance to show that the fishermen have not the profits to which they are entitled. That their services in the last war deserve rewards, &c., their country shared with them the glory of their gallant behaviour; but they alone received the rewards they aimed at. The twelve hundred ships they took was a compensation for services and a reward for those exploits. It is true, they annoyed the enemy; it is certain their prizes sometimes fed, armed, and clothed our armies; but it is not said that they did not receive payment for furnishing those things.

But here we are asked, Is it not of great consequence to the United States to employ those bold, skillful seamen in our service that we may enjoy the commercial advantage they give us in peace, and their powerful assistance in war? To this I reply, that it ought first to be proved that Congress has the power and authority to give them the encouragement demanded; and even if Congress have that power, it ought to be shown that it can be extended to the benefit of the sailors of some of the States, and not to those of every State.

Cod. Fisheries.

It may be said that Congress may with as much propriety give bounties to our hunters in the Western country, to raise up a nursery of soldiers as a barrier against the Indians, and to promote the fur trade, as to give drawbacks and bounties to the fishermen of the Eastern States, with a view to encourage fisheries, and to raise a nursery of seamen for their defence against enemies who may invade our Eastern frontiers. Indeed, if defence be the object in view, we might as well give bounties to sturdy landmen to be in readiness and constant training for war.

Indeed, sir, I confess I am not altogether convinced that, if Congress have this power, it ought to be thus exerted; because it is not clear to me that those fishermen would not be more profitable to the United States, if they were cultivating the lands which now lie waste, and raising families, which would be of ten times more value than their fisheries. A nursery of virtuous families, which will produce soldiers, sailors, husbandmen, and statesmen, must be preferable to a mere nursery of sailors, who generally live single, and often perish at sea. I always look upon the loss of a crew to an infant Republic as the loss almost of a new State.

I speak of this question, however, as a citizen of the United States, as a member of this House. Were I to discuss it as a citizen of Massachusetts, and in their Legislature, I should say, as the State is nearly filled with inhabitants, and our fishermen increase our commerce in peace, protect us in war, and, indeed, even enrich us by their prizes, it is our interest to encourage them to the utmost, and to prevent their going into the service of other countries. I might, therefore, as a member of the Legislature of that State, do all in my power to procure bounties for them, and indeed for all the sailors belonging to that State; but I should not think of applying to Congress for their assistance; not only because I doubt their right to afford it, but because I should look upon it as in some degree derogatory to the sovereignty and independence of the State. I should look upon such an interference of Congress as a step towards swallowing up the powers of the State Governments, and as consolidating the different States into one Government, which the wise and virtuous in every State always protested against as dangerous to their liberties; the fear of which consolidation prevented many good men from voting for the adoption of the new Government.

The framers of the Constitution guarded so much against a possibility of such partial preferences as might be given, if Congress had the right to grant them, that, even to encourage learning and useful arts, the granting of patents is the extent of their power. And surely nothing could be less dangerous to the sovereignty or interest of the individual States than the encouragement which might be given to ingenious inventors or promoters of valuable inventions in the arts and sciences. The encouragement which the General Government might give to the fine arts, to commerce, to manufactures, and agriculture, might, if judiciously applied, redound to the honor of Congress, and the splendor, magnificence, and real advantage of the United States; but the wise framers of our Constitution saw that, if Congress had the power of exerting what has been called a royal munificence for these purposes, Congress might, like many royal benefactors, misplace their munificence; might elevate sycophants, and be inattentive to men unfriendly to the views of Government; might reward the ingenuity of the citizens of one State, and neglect a much greater genius of another. A citizen of a powerful State, it might be said, was attended to, whilst that of one of less weight in the Federal scale was totally neglected. It is not sufficient, to remove these objections, to say, as some gentlemen have said, that Congress is incapable of partiality or absurdities, and that they are as far from committing them as my colleagues or myself. I tell them the Constitution was formed on a supposition of human frailty, and to restrain abuses of mistaken power. The Constitution has been said by some one to be, like answers of the oracles of old, capable of various and opposite constructions; that it has been ingeniously contrived, like some of them, to suit two events—a Republican or a Monarchical issue. I will not pretend to say that this is not, in some instances, too just an observation; nor will I undertake to deny that it was not the intention of some of the Convention that such ambiguities might be in their Constitution, to correspond with the critical and ambiguous state of the American mind respecting Government; but I will boldly affirm, that, whatever the theories of that day might lead some to think respecting the application of Monarchical principles to the Government of the United States, no one can, at this day, pretend that they are applicable to their circumstances, their dispositions, or interests, or even are agreeable to the wishes of the people. Even before the adoption of the Constitution, when the rights of men had not been so thoroughly investigated as they since have been, it must be remembered, that whole States, and large and respectable minorities in other States, complained of and objected to the Aristocratical and Monarchical features of the new Government. In vain did the friends of the new Government—friends of order, of union, or of liberty—contend that the powers granted by the Constitution which appeared so alarming were such as would never be exerted but when all good men would acknowledge the necessity of exercising them, and that, indeed, they would be explained or restrained by some future amendments. The sagacious and eloquent Henry shook his head at such promises, sighed, and submitted to the will of the majority—a small one, indeed—but foretold, from his knowledge of the human heart, what would be done and said in justification of every measure which might extend the power of Congress.

Is it politic and wise, then, Mr. Chairman, to exert the power contended for, even if it be authorized by the Constitution? May not the interference of Congress in the business of regulating the trade of the Eastern States, excite, if not envy on account of a supposed partiality, a jealousy lest

Cod Fisheries.

Congress undertake to intermeddle in the commercial regulations of other States? May not Congress, with equal propriety, undertake to regulate the tobacco, the rice, and indigo trade, as well as that of the fisheries? If they intermeddle in the business of sailors, why not in that of manufacturers and farmers? Where, I may ask with my colleague, may they not go on in their zeal, and I may add, in their laudable pursuit, of promoting the general welfare—and how totally may they be mistaken? If jealousy of rival States, instead of mutual satisfaction and pleasure—if distrust and suspicion of Congress, instead of confidence in their measures, be the consequence—how will the Union be promoted, or the General Government secured? However virtuously disposed the present members may be, (and I am ready to applaud their honest intentions,) let them consider, sir, that they had better suppress their patriotic emotions, than give a pretext for their successors to abuse the powers which they now wish to exert for the public good. I know they will quote the opinion of as wise and virtuous a citizen as is in the United States. I know his patriotism, and know well his true Republican principles; but, sir, with the freedom of a fellow-citizen, I take the liberty of saying, that his honest zeal, like that of the friends of the bill, has led him into a mistake.* That able statesman and virtuous citizen, like the eloquent advocates of the bill, has considered the acts now quoted as a full sanction for the one before the Committee. But I am of opinion, that those acts had better be repealed than give a sanction to the enacting of a law which goes to the establishing of bounties, or drawbacks, or by whatever other name they are called, which may be used to the partial encouragement of any branch of trade or employment whatsoever. I shall therefore vote against the bill before us, and, to get rid of it, shall vote for striking out of it the first section, according to the motion now before the Committee. As a member of this House, I shall think it my duty to protect the fisheries, and every other branch of our commerce, the fisherman as well as every other citizen, as far as may be within my ability; but I am not permitted, as a member of Congress, I humbly conceive, to select the fisheries and fishermen as objects of more consequence than any other branches of trade, or persons employed in them, lest Congress should not only show a mistaken attachment, or even if judiciously placed, excite jealousies and discontents between the States, and distrust, destructive of their weight and influence. My constant wish has been to see Congress confined to such acts as would form a more perfect union, promote the general welfare, insure domestic tranquillity, and engage the confidence of our fellow-citizens.

My wish is, that the members of Congress would leave their respective States in the full enjoyment of every right and privilege they held before their adoption of the new Constitution, which can be exercised without prejudice to the General Government. Let the Legislatures of the different States encourage, as far as in their power, the commerce, agriculture, or manufactures of their respective States; and let Congress, as far as can be consistent with the most steady impartiality, patronize their patriotic exertions, by wise regulations of their commerce with foreign nations, such as may open as full an intercourse with those nations as the States may desire. The emulation of the sister States in commerce, manufactures, or agriculture, would lead to the early establishment of that branch of either to which each State might be best adapted. This rivalry could produce no jealousy, no general national discontent in the States, no localities in Congress. Virginia would not attempt to rival Massachusetts in her fisheries or carrying business, nor will South Carolina and Georgia rival the manufactures of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Each State may rejoice to see its sister States enjoying the advantages with which Heaven has blessed them; and Congress, if confined to subjects which admit not of local considerations, may debate with temper and decide with unbiassed judgment. I confess I have wished that Congress possessed the power that the friends of the bill tell us we do possess, and tell us we have exerted; but, on examining the Constitution with a view to my wish, I found reason to think, not only that Congress has not that power, but that it ought not to possess it, unless the Constitution was intended to establish a consolidated Government on the ruin of the State Legislatures; but this, I conceive, cannot be the case, because the Constitution guarantees to the States their respective Republican Governments. The general powers of Congress, no doubt, ought to be (as they are) adequate to the purpose of forming a more perfect union than subsisted under the Confederation, to establish justice, &c.; but, as they are bound to guarantee to the States their respective Republican forms of Government, I cannot conceive how any of these powers can be employed, consistently with the ends for which they were given, in diminishing the power and sovereignty of the State Legislatures. How Congress can interfere in the regulations respecting the merchants and their sailors at Marblehead with more propriety than with those at Philadelphia, Norfolk, or Charleston, I cannot conceive; nor how this interference could take place without alarming those States, I know not. Viewing the bill before us in this light, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against it, and, as I said before, to get rid of it, shall vote to strike out the first section, according to the motion now before the Committee.

The question on striking out the first section was taken, and negatived—32 to 26.

— WEDNESDAY, February 8.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, together with a statement of certain articles of expense, which have occurred in the Department of Foreign Affairs, and for which no provision is made by law. board the British navy.] The Message and accompanying Papers were referred to a select committee, to examine and report.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying certain communications with the Executive of Virginia relative to the existing temporary defensive protection of the exposed frontiers of that State, pursuant to the orders of the President of the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances barred by the limitations heretofore established; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Comfort Sands, and others, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE COD FISHERIES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the encouragement of the Bank and other Cod-fisheries, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein."

On a motion to strike out the words "bounty now allowed," and insert allowance now made, &c.—

Mr. GILES observed, that he conceived the vote of yesterday against striking out the first section, was a decision in favor of the policy of granting Governmental aid to the fisheries; the inquiry of to-day will be on what terms this aid shall be granted? He felt but little regret at the decision of yesterday, because he had himself previously contemplated some reasons, not unimportant, to justify that decision, and others had been suggested by several gentlemen in the course of the debate. The principles of this policy, he thought, however, might be combated by reasons of at least equal, and as far as he was able to judge, of paramount importance; but as he admitted considerable weight in the reasons on each side of the question, he was not particularly tenacious of the preference which his own opinion suggested. When he first mentioned his doubts respecting the principle of the bill, it was with diffidence, and those doubts in some measure arose from an idea that the bill contained a direct bounty upon occupation; upon a more minute examination, he thought the term bounty unnecessarily introduced into the bill, and that the object of it could be answered without the use of terms, which might hereafter be deemed to contain a decision upon the general principle of the constitutional right to grant bounties; it was to avoid any thing which might wear the appearance of such a decision, that induced him to make the present motion.

He proceeded to remark, that as great a difference of opinion often existed respecting the precise meaning of the terms used, as the consequences which flow from them after attaining such precision of meaning; and it is of importance to the present discussion that an accurate definition of the terms used in the bill, and those proposed to be used, should be had. The avowed object of the bill is not to increase, but to transmute the sum, or a portion thereof, now allowed to the fishermen in lieu of the drawback upon salt, from the merchant who is now supposed to receive the sole benefit, to the fishermen really employed in the fishing vessels. This is a mere chimerical project, but if it be admitted that this is the object to be effected by the bill, the term bounty is improperly applied.

A gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES,] who rests the defence of this bill almost solely upon this position, that those who receive the benefit intended by it, are of right entitled to such benefit in consideration of a previous advancement in value, and that this bill contains a mere permission to them to retain their own, has at the same time declared, that he thought the term bounty the most proper and technical, to convey this idea. In this, the gentleman appears to have deviated from his usual accuracy. A bounty is the granting a benefit without a correspondent return in value; a drawback is the retaking of something in consideration of a previous advancement; this is always founded upon a consideration previously received—that is a grant of favor ex mero motu. But the great characteristic distinction between bounties and drawbacks as they essentially relate to the administration of this Government, consists in the Governmental objects to which they may severally be applied: drawbacks are necessarily confined to commercial regulations; bounties may be extended to every possible object of Government, and may pervade the whole minutiae of police. They may not only be extended to commerce, but to learning, agriculture, manufactures, and even the sacredness of religion will be found too feeble to furnish complete protection from their influence. The people of the United States have always been scrupulously tenacious of a constitutional security for the most free and equal exercise of this right, but through the medium of bounties, even this right may be invaded, and the only security against such invasion must be Governmental discretion. The same characteristic distinction will attend that species of bounty which may incidentally result from commercial regulations; and direct bounties upon occupation founded upon the broad basis of discretionary right. The specification in the Constitution of the right to regulate commerce, may possibly in some cases give rise to this indirect species of bounty, not from any right in the Constitution to grant bounties, but as the necessary result from the specified right to make commercial regulations; and this specification can be the only foundation of justification to this indirect species of bounty, but there is no specification in the Constitution of a right to regulate learning, or agriculture, manufactures, or religion, and so far as the sense of the Constitution can be collected, it rather forbids than authorizes the exercise of that right.

Arguments used to deduce any given authority from the term general welfare, abstractedly from the specification of some particular authority, are dangerous in the extreme to rights constitutionally reserved, and ought ever to be viewed with great caution and suspicion. They serve directly to show that this Government is not only consolidated in all its parts, but that it is a consolidated Government of unlimited discretion; that it contains no constitutional limitation or restriction. If any given authority be inferred from the term general welfare in the abstract, any other authority is equally deducible from it, because the term is applicable to every possible object of Government, and differs only in degree, as to the several Governmental objects.

He could not see the force of the novel and curious distinction taken by a gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HULLHOUSE] between general welfare and particular welfare; for every particular welfare, however minute, may be in a degree for the general welfare, and if the decision respecting the existence of this distinction, have no other limitation than Congressional discretion, it is equally destructive of all constitutional restraint. Gentlemen who have advocated this principle of construction, appear startled at some consequences suggested to result from it, and have denied that they have made the admission of such consequences. This is true, nor have those in reply so asserted, but they have taken up the principles of construction furnished by its advocates, and made the application of it to the consequences which they themselves infer; and if the principle be admitted, it is undeniable that the conclusions drawn from it will necessarily follow in their utmost latitude.

A gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BARNWELL] confidently spoke of the inherent rights of this Government; this is a new source of authority, and totally inapplicable to this Government. If there be inherent rights in Governments at all, they must belong to Governments growing out of a state of society, and not to a Government deriving all its authorities by charter from previously existing Governments, or the people of those Governments. In such a Government, the exercise of every authority not contained in the instrument, or deducible from it by a fair and candid construction, is an unjustifiable assumption and usurpation. He did not mean to analyze this subject further at this time, and had been led into these general remarks, because the impatience of the Committee had caused him to refrain from delivering these sentiments at that time.

He would remark further, that bounties in all countries and at all times, have been the effect of favoritism; they have only served to divert the current of industry from its natural channel, into one less advantageous or productive; and in fact, they are nothing more than Governmental theft committed upon the rights of one part of the community, and an unmerited Governmental munificence to the other. In this country, and under this Government, they present an aspect peculiarly dreadful and deformed.

To contemplate the subjects upon which bounties are to operate in the United States, the nature of the Government to dispense them, the State preferences which now do and will forever, more or less, continue to exist, the impossibility of an equal operation of bounties throughout the United States, upon any subject whatever, should be considered; and one of these two effects will necessarily follow the exercise of them; either the very existence of the Government will be destroyed, or its administration must be radically changed, it must be converted into the most complex system of tyranny and favoritism.

He observed, that it is not unfrequent at this time to hear of an Eastern and Southern interest, and he had for some time silently and indignantly seen, or thought he saw, attempts by this means to influence the deliberations of this House upon almost every important question. So far as he was the insulted object of these attempts, he felt that contempt for their authors, which appeared to him to be the correspondent tribute to the impurity of their designs; yet he thought that this had been the most formidable and effectual material machine which had been yet used in the administration of Government. But one great mischief he apprehended from establishing the principle of the unrestrained right to grant bounties, will be, that it will make the difference of interest between Eastern and Southern, so far as they differ in their respective States of manufacture and agriculture, real, which is now only ideal. It will make that party real, which is now artificial. The jealousies and suspicions arising from party, will then have a substantial foundation, which now have no foundation in fact, but are ingeniously stimulated by a few, for the purpose of effecting particular objects; as long as the Government shall be administered liberally and impartially, as long as the principle of reciprocal demand and supply between East and South shall remain inviolate, so long there can exist no essential distinct interest between them; but the instant bounties or Governmental preferences are granted to occupation, that instant is created a separate and distinct interest, not wholly between East and South, but between the manufacturer and the cultivator of the soil. There will still exist a community of agricultural interest throughout the United States, and he hoped the time was not far distant, when a common sympathy will be felt by the whole of that class of the community. For these reasons, he hoped the motion would prevail. The bill having been gone through with, and amended, the Committee rose and reported it with amendments which the House immediately took into consideration and adopted. The bill was then further amended and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 9.
THE COD FISHERIES.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the encouragement of the Bank and other Cod Fisheries, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein," together with the amendments thereto, was read the third time; and the question being put that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 38, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, John W. Kitter, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, Samuel Livermore, Joshua Madison, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, Nathaniel Niles, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, Thomas Tredwell, John Vining, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and Artemas Ward.

NAYS.—Messrs. John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, John Brown, William B. Giles, William Barry Grove, Daniel Heister, Philip Key, Nathaniel Macon, John Francis Mercer, Andrew Moore, William Vans Murray, John Page, Josiah Parker, Joshua Seney, John Steele, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Resolved, That the title of the said bill be, "An act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein."

Mr. LAURANCE presented a petition from the tanners and carriers of the city of New York, praying relief from the hardships they labor under, in consequence of the exportation of tanners' bark. Referred to a select committee.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, &c.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. W. SMITH in the Chair, on a bill (received from the Senate) relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President.

The ninth section was struck out, in which the President of the Senate pro tempore was designated to act as President in case of vacancies in both of the above mentioned offices.

A motion was then made to add a new section to the bill, appointing the senior Associate Judge as the person to fill the vacancy. A motion was made to amend this proposition, by substituting the Secretary of State, instead of the senior Associate Judge. A short debate ensued, after which, the Committee rose without taking the question, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State lay before the House copies of such laws as have been adopted and published by the Governor and Judges of the territory North west of the Ohio.

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to furnish the sitting member, and the petitioner, James Jackson, at the request of either party, with copies of all such documents, evidences, and testimony, as are in his possession, or that may come to the hands of the SPEAKER, previous to the time of trying the validity of the election of a member to represent the lower district of the State of Georgia, in the Congress of the United States.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, &c.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President, in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President;" and, after some time spent therein, reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and are as follow:

Strike out the ninth section, in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

In lieu of the said ninth section, insert:

"And be it further enacted, That, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of State, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

Whereupon, the said first amendment being again read, and the question put to strike out the said ninth section, in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 22, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Elbridge Gerry, Benjamin Goodhue, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Aaron Kitchell, John W. Kitter, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, William Smith, Peter Sylvester, Thomas Tudor Tucker, and Jeremiah Wadsworth.

The second amendment being again read, and the question put to insert in lieu of the said ninth section, the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of State, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

It was resolved in the affirmative.

The House then proceeded to the farther consideration of the said bill; made some progress therein, and then adjourned.

MONDAY, February 13.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to continue an act entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations;" and that Mr. STERNETT, Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, and Mr. BALDWIN, be the said committee.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President, in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President;" Whereupon—

Resolved, That the said bill with the amendments, be again recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives, after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven—Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, in the Chair. The bill was read through by the Clerk.

The first section being repeated by the Chairman, Mr. SENEY moved that the blank should be filled with the word "thirty," which would determine that the ratio of representation should be 30,000.

This motion was opposed by Mr. HILLHOUSE, on the old ground of its unequal operation.

Mr. GERRY replied to Mr. HILLHOUSE. He observed that this apportionment on the aggregate Federal number would be more equal than by the ratio of 33,000; but this had been rejected by the Senate; and as the ratio of 33,000 would not perfectly cure the difficulty, and would operate to reduce the whole number of the Representatives, he conceived that no new light had been thrown on the subject to induce the House to consent to such diminution.

Mr. MERCER entered into a general view of the subject. He supported a large representation, and urged its importance, as it respects the democratical part of the community. The theory of Government is the same, whether it respects a free or a despotic Government; it is not a small number that can govern in any country. Standing armies supply in Despotic Governments the place of a large representation in a Free Government. Still, the operations of Government, in both cases, depend on a large number of people.

The question for inserting 30,000 was carried in the affirmative—30 to 21.

Mr. MERCER then moved to strike out "the third day of March, 1793," and to insert "the first day of October, 1792"—referring to the period when the States shall be represented by the number arising from the first enumeration. He informed the House that Virginia had already made provision to send forward their supplementary numbers. He urged the right of the States respectively to fill up their representation agreeably to the enumeration, &c.

Mr. GERRY supported the motion.

Mr. HILLHOUSE suggested another mode. He proposed that the present Congress should expire after the present session, and a new House be elected agreeable to the census, and to meet at the time to which the present Congress may be adjourned. He urged many advantages which would result from this plan.

Mr. MERCER said, his idea was, that the choosing these additional members would be only filling up vacancies.

Mr. MURRAY was for striking out "the third day of March, 1793," for the purpose of inserting an earlier day. The great objection is its inconvenience. It is said the members which now compose this House will have to continue by law another session, and the supplemental members would have to continue but to fill the intermediate space of time from the election to the 3d of March. He begged gentlemen to give him leave to say, that the only possible obstacle to their thinking as he did arose from themselves—from a desire, he would not say how disinterested, to continue in power longer than they were entitled to remain under the Constitution. The act of Congress declaratory of the time which members were to continue was the sole obstacle to the gratification of the people in one of their best rights. This act, founded in error, ought previously to be repealed, and then no difficulty, either from the construction of the Constitution or from inconvenience, could be raised to the wish that the additional Representatives should take their seats immediately after the next general election. This act produced a mischievous and unthought-of solecism in the Government. It separated representation from confidence, and violated responsibility, which is the very soul of the Government.

The people could not but be astonished that, after the last general election, the members of Congress whom they had not chosen still continued there to hold their seats, and to act as upon their confidence and trust. Surely one of the most obvious truths in a Government by representation is, that election shall be the criterion of confidence, and that a continuance to discharge a trust after it is withdrawn overturns every idea of representation.

He wished the Committee to reflect that the principal objection to the motion was easily removed, if members would act a disinterested part; and that if it be admitted that the duration of the present Congress is the objection to the admission of the supplemental members, gentlemen cannot hesitate between the gratification of what evidently appears to be the rights of the people, under a fair construction of the Constitution, and a declaratory law, which is repealable, and which is so contrary to reason. The objection is removable—the right is permanent. It is certainly of more consequence to adhere to the principle of a just and numerous representation, and to adopt an early day to give it operation, than to give the principle the go-by, merely to support a stretched duration of our term, under a law that oversets the most obvious truths and reasoning on representation. As to the members from Georgia, if the law giving an extra term to the seats of members was not repealed, he would still vote for Georgia's having three members till the term expired; but at all events he hoped the motion would be agreed to.

The motion was finally disagreed to.

TUESDAY, February 14.

Mr. STERNETT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland, and to continue for a longer time "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," so far as the same respects the States of Georgia and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations; which was received, and read twice and committed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, &c.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President, in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President."

A motion made yesterday, to insert a clause restricting the number of Electors to the number of the present Senate and House of Representatives, being put and negatived—

Mr. GERRY moved to insert a clause which specifies that "the Electors shall be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which the several States may by law be entitled at the time when the President and Vice President thus to be chosen should come into office: Provided, always, That where no apportionment of Representatives shall have been made after any enumeration, at the time of choosing Electors, then the number of Electors shall be according to the existing apportionment of Senators and Representatives."

This motion, with very little objection, was adopted; its propriety will appear from the following remarks made by Mr. MURRAY, who said he was in favor of the whole, both the proposition and the proviso: the first meditates a more equal representation of the wishes of the people of America in the election of the two great officers of the State; the proviso guards against a confusion which might take place without the provision. The present representation in Congress is by no means equal; the States, in their conventional deliberation, produced the present proportion of Representatives more from compromise than authenticated data; no census had then measured to the public the proportions of population which one State bore to another; and Representatives, including Senators and Electors of President and Vice President, being the same in number, and the scale of Representatives being unfounded in facts and evidence, the inequality, which is evident, is not to be wondered at. This proposition remedies the inequality; the proviso was not perfectly agreeable to his wishes; but as it refers the number of Electors to a scale of representation ascertained by an actual enumeration, and at the same time will remove the probability of confusion by making each State uniform with others as to the rule of fixing the number of Electors, he should vote for it. This was a great object attained. It is not a difficult thing to foresee, without jealousy or suspicion, that, unless the States are uniform as to the rule of apportioning Electors, the repose of the Union might be violated. Should this law refer to an apportionment to be hereafter made by Congress, this event might take place. A disagreement might happen between this House and the Senate, and, in the tumults and contumacy by which they might be agitated towards each other, no apportionment might be made; in this situation the Executive would be left at the mercy of the two Houses, and the order of things violently deranged. But even if the people, having a census before them, though not acted on by Congress, were to make their elections agreeably to what might be their respective ideas of the apportionment to which the census apparently entitled them, yet we are not certain that they would all act by a uniform rule; and, if they acted without such rule, there might appear before the tribunal of the public two Presidents, or two men of great power claiming the Presidency of America. This would be an evil of great and alarming size, and one which he so much deprecated, that he willingly yielded to the proviso, which he thought would tend to lessen the opportunity by which designing men could effect it.

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President, in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President," together with the amendments thereto, was read the third time and passed.

Apportionment Bill.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," was read twice and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, after an Apportionment of Representatives, after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 16.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 24 day of March, 1797.

Mr. VINING's proposition being under consideration—the first article of which is, that New Hampshire shall be entitled to five Representatives—

Mr. LIVERMORE rose in support of the principle of the proposition, which is to apportion the Representatives agreeably to the aggregate number of the people of the United States; he urged, in brief, the arguments which had before been adduced on the importance of making the representation as equal as possible, and concluded with saying he hoped that the number proposed for New Hampshire (five) would be agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN said, that if New Hampshire should have five members, Georgia, according to its present number, which is about one half of that of New Hampshire, would be entitled to three—but this is not proposed, nor do the members from that State expect it should be.

Mr. KITTERA observed, that apportioning Representatives to the State of Virginia, on the principle contended for by the gentleman from New Hampshire, would give Virginia twenty-four members.

Mr. NILES supported the proposition. He urged that the fractions would be diminished on the whole by it; and though perfect equality is not attainable, he could not conceive on what gentleman founded their opposition to that plan which came the nearest to this equality, and as the Constitution fully warrants a liberal though strictly just construction, the apportionment now contemplated he hoped would be agreed to.

Mr. MANSON repeated the substance of what he had before offered in objection to this proposition. Fractions will exist, said he, on every possible plan; this is to be a permanent law, and in its operation will probably increase those fractions.

The Constitution refers to the respective numbers of the States, and not to any aggregate number. The proposition breaks down the barriers between the State and General Governments, and involves a consolidation.

Mr. LIVERMORE replied to Mr. KITTERA. He observed, that if Virginia was represented agreeably to the proposition contemplated for New Hampshire, that is, four members, Virginia would be entitled to only seventeen—this would appear on calculation.

Mr. WILLIAMSON contended that, by the Constitution, whatever ratio was adopted it is to be applied as a divisor to the number of persons in each State respectively. This idea of an aggregate number looks like a consolidation of the Government; not only so, but the supplementary member proposed for those States who had not inhabitants to vote for such supplementary member, would not be elected agreeably to the Constitution.

Mr. SENEY opposed the proposition. He observed, that it was very extraordinary, indeed, that those persons who, in the previous discussion, were opposed to the ratio of thirty thousand on account of giving so large a representation, should now advocate this proposition, which in fact increases the whole number. He hoped that it would be rejected.

Mr. VINING said a few words to exculpate the friends of the proposition from the charge of inconsistency.

Mr. VENABLE stated various particulars to show that the plan of transferring the fractions from one State to another, comparing them with the general ratio, would produce greater inequality than the plan contended for by those who oppose the present motion.

Mr. LIVERMORE justified himself from the charge of inconsistency; he was always in favor of an equal representation; with this he began, and with this he should end; and he was not solicitous which way the vote determined the matter, provided the principle of equality was adhered to, and therefore he should not regret New Hampshire being restricted to four members, provided Virginia had only 17—which is the highest number she will be entitled to, apportioning them agreeably to four for New Hampshire. He observed that the friends of the proposition might be outvoted by numbers; he wished, if it could be done, that they might be outreasoned as well as outnumbered.

Mr. LAURANCE said, having advocated in a former discussion the ratio of thirty thousand, he hoped he should not be charged with inconsistency if he gave his assent to the present proposition, as he had explicitly declared that he advocated that number as giving the largest representation—and this proposition not only preserved that idea, but enhanced the number, and on more equal principles. He then entered into an examination of the clause in the Constitution respecting taxes and Representatives, which it is expressly declared shall be according to numbers. He reproached the idea of members considering themselves as Representatives.

representatives merely of particular parts of the Union. The members of this House are the Representatives of America. The States, as States, are represented in the Senate. A member of this House from Georgia is a Representative of the State of New York, as much as if he came from the latter State. Conceiving the idea of the meaning of the Constitution which he had given to be just, he should vote for the proposition.

Mr. FINDLEY said he should vote against the proposition. He did not like the principle of it, if it had any; he rather thought it was destitute of all principle, for it contemplates no ratio at all—it is rather an arbitrary apportionment of the representation. Adverting to the article respecting taxation, he observed that the proposition does not accord with the idea of the gentlemen who advocate it, for still there will be fractions left, and are not these fractions to be taxed? In reply to Mr. LAURANCE's remarks respecting local representation, he observed that the gentleman's idea proved too much; for, if the idea of representing local interests is destroyed, the essence of representation is done away altogether, and all responsibility is lost.

Mr. ANNEA.—The Constitution says, that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their 'representative numbers,' &c." The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative."

Deductions from the above—

1st. You may have as many as one to 30,000 of the whole number of the Union.

2d. You may have as many as one to 30,000 of the whole number of the Union.

3d. Supposing the amendment ratified, you must have 100 members, if one to 30,000 will give them. These principles were not disputed till lately. But it is now pretended that the ratio may be applied to each State, and the number of Representatives no more than the multiples of 30,000 in each State. Some even go so far as to say that it must be so applied, and that Congress may not have as many members as one to 30,000 of the whole Union.

This construction seems to be violent.

1st. The word Representatives, first used, can only mean the whole number of Representatives, for they are to be apportioned among the several States. The word is used in the same sense afterwards—"The number of Representatives shall not exceed one to 30,000," again meaning the whole number of Representatives. The whole number of Representatives shall not exceed one to 30,000 of the whole people. To avoid this obvious meaning, they say it should read, "shall not exceed one to 30,000 in each State." These words are supplied wholly without authority.

2d. The clause merely restrains the number of Representatives so as not to exceed one to 30,000. The members in Congress might have been increased to any number, had not this restriction existed. It is a restrictive, and not an explanatory clause. It curtails, but cannot be supposed to change the natural import of the preceding power. It is against the fair rules of construction so to change it.

3d. The sense is perfect without the words one to 30,000 in each State. Expressum facit cessare tacitum.

4th. The construction makes tautology. The first clause having directed the manner of apportioning Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers, might have been wholly omitted, one to 30,000 in each State being a final apportionment.

5th. Words must not be supplied by construction repugnant to words expressed. The result of an apportionment according to numbers, as first directed by the Constitution, differs in terms from a ratio of one to 30,000 in each State. It differs in its operation no less. The members in the next House will be 113. Apportion them according to numbers among the several States, Virginia would have 19—19 being to 113, as 630,000, the numbers of Virginia, to 3,619,000, the whole people of the United States. But by the construction which supplies the words in each State, she will have 21 members.

6th. The words one to 30,000 are merely restrictive of the number in Congress from the whole people, and do not change the sense of the first clause, for taxes and Representatives are to be apportioned according to numbers. The construction cannot be extended to taxes with any good sense. Yet, as taxes and Representatives are to be apportioned similarly, the construction applying to the one should apply to the other. Yet the advocates of this construction say that taxes shall be imposed according to numbers, and not the multiples of 30,000 in each State. Taking it for proved, that the sense of the first clause is not changed, but its operation limited by the clause shall not exceed one to 30,000, it remains to see what is the sense of the first clause standing alone. "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers." The Rule-of-Three will show the number of members any State is entitled to. Thus, as the whole number 3,619,000 is to the number of the next House 113, so is the number of persons in a State, say Virginia, which are 630,000, to her quota of members. The result is 19 members. The bill, pursuing another rule, obtained as we have seen by a forced construction, gives that State 21 members.

7th. The amendment to the Constitution refutes the sense of the construction. The words are, "there shall be one for every 30,000 till the number shall amount to 100." Plainly the whole number of the nation is intended. The whole number is to be formed by one for every 30,000. The words contended for are therefore excluded, and no construction will avail in this place to add them.

8th. The ratio of one to 30,000 in each State is inconsistent with this amendment; for, according to that, 3,000,000 of persons must have 100 members in Congress. Had the numbers by the census fallen short of a surplus beyond 3,000,000, sufficient to cover the fractions or lost numbers, this amendment to the Constitution could not be carried into execution, according to the principles of the bill. For the amendment requiring 100 members, the numbers being more than 3,000,000, it would appear that 100 members could not be obtained by applying the ratio of 30,000 to the numbers in each State, instead of taking the entire number of the Union. Here, then, would be a constitutional obligation to have 100 members in Congress, and an absolute impossibility of having them according to the principles of this bill.

10th. The number of Representatives is limited not to exceed one for 30,000. Pursue the letter of the Constitution, and avoid all construction, the number of Representatives will be 120. Adopt the construction that you are to have no more than one to 30,000 will give you, and you bring down the number to 113.

But this process, erroneous as it is, only fixes the number—it does not apportion them. That should be done according to numbers, and Virginia would not be found entitled to 21 of 113. According to the principle of the bill, if it may be called a principle, it is defective. The letter and true intention of the Constitution will be violated by a forced construction, which gives some States more and others less than their due share of the Representatives.

Mr. PAGE.—I rise not to enter into a debate on the question before you, sir, because, as I said yesterday, it being out of order, it did not admit of debate. It is true, the question is now a little varied, but it comes to the same thing; for, if we vote in favor of it, we must vote contrary to a solemn decision of this very Committee. What I wish to observe, sir, is in reply to the member from New Hampshire, who seemed dissatisfied with my ideas of order; and to make one remark on what the member from Massachusetts [Mr. Ames] said, as to truth being his aim. As to the point of order, it must be most evident that it is no purpose to put a question in a Committee of the Whole, if, when the sense of the Committee has been taken, another question may be proposed, which may lead to a decision directly contrary to that before made: but the gentleman tells us that the Committee were taken in; that they began, too, at the wrong end; but surely, sir, this cannot be said, for the blank in the sixteenth line was not filled up till after solemn debate; and it was generally understood, that by filling it up, we should fix the principle of the bill. On that question, the ratio of one for thirty thousand was established, and applied in a clause respecting South Carolina in such a manner as, without inconsistency, may lead the Committee to fill up the blanks now under consideration. But, sir, if such debating as is contended for be allowable, when can the business before us be finished? How many amendments of this sort may not be proposed? Is it not sufficient for gentlemen to vote against the motion, if they dislike it, and then in the House, where they will have a right to be heard, to propose their own amendments? There, if they can convince the House that the Committee were in an error, they may correct it; but surely, sir, the Committee cannot now, without violating order, and being charged with a great inconsistency, agree to the motion before you. Truth is my aim, said the member from Massachusetts; it is mine as much as his: but, without pretending to decide whether his construction of the Constitution is right or not, I will ask him, how are we to arrive at the truth we now aim at? That is, how find the numbers to be inserted in the blanks, if his construction be right? For, according to that construction, we must apply the ratio to the whole Federal number of the United States, before we can find the number of Representatives for any one State; and can this be done till South Carolina has made the return of her census? And if this construction be right, may not South Carolina, if it be the interest of that State to retain its present representation, keep back that return? This construction, then, is attended with an insuperable difficulty, and, indeed, I think with my colleague, [Mr. Madison,] was never thought of till lately within this House. Our constituents put the construction which the majority of the Committee and of the House have hitherto put on the Constitution; and several States have shown, by their acts, that their construction is the same.

Mr. VINING said, if by consolidation is meant a consolidation of interests, he gloried in the idea; but if a consolidation of States is intended, he was opposed to such an idea as much as any member on the floor. Adverting to Mr. FINDLEY's idea of local interests being represented, he contended he had given up the contest; for if the gentleman is sincere, he must concede that the proposition now under consideration, more perfectly accorded with that idea than his own. Virginia, represented as Delaware, would have but about ten members: are the local interests, then, of Delaware, represented by one member, when Virginia is represented by twenty-one?

Mr. MURRAY hoped that number would not be inserted. If, however, the motion were carried, he wished its friends would, if consistent with order, amend the preliminary section of the bill, by inserting the principle under which this motion is made. The principle is, that the ratio of thirty thousand is to be applied to the aggregate number of the Continent, and not to the aggregate number of each State. He could not, on the fullest and most liberal reflection, give his assent to such a principle; but observed, that at all events some principle, whatever it might be, ought to show that the vote of the House was regulated by rule, rather than by expedience. On a question so important as that of Representation, the measure agreed to ought to result from some established principle. As the bill now stands, it will appear altogether arbitrary; and rights in which all are concerned, seem to flow more from grace, and the strength of a majority, than a settled system. If there is a principle in the bill, it is to be discovered merely in its provisions; whereas, on such a subject, its light, destined to guide the understanding, ought to be steady and apparent, and not glimmer dimly through the intricate windings of various provisions. These ought to have been natural conclusions, resulting from the principle, rather than the sources from which it is to be inferred. It ought to have been settled as soon as the bill came in, and before a vote indicative of it had been moved. As the whole of this subject had been hitherto completely sifted, he would make but one or two remarks. The framers of the Constitution could never have thought of this mode of applying a ratio. All the guards in favor of State Governments, show that the States were viewed respectively and severally. The laws relative to elections are entirely and exclusively in the hands of the States. Had the Convention intended the aggregate of the whole, and not of States, should be the object of apportionment by ratio, they would have kept the election law in the hands of Congress; they would have empowered Congress to divide the Continent into districts. If New Hampshire has five members here, and her aggregate divided by thirty thousand would give her but four, (which is the case,) she will have an undue influence on this floor; as the weight and power that any State has here, ought to be but equal to her numbers. It has been laid down as doctrine here, that every member represents the whole. He could not comprehend the force of that position in the use and latitude in which it was applied. He would not annex any meaning to theoretical truths, which did not admit of a wholesome practice. A member here represents his constituents; he legislates for the whole. The people whose rights and interests are the subject of legislation, are a whole; from their unity of interests, and from their union of Government, results the general duty of the Representative. His responsibility to his own circle of constituents, is on his duty discharged or neglected to the whole; because the true good of the several parts consists in the general prosperity of the whole. Where a member represents one district, he meant to give, and show a truth, on the use of which alone he could conceive a practical operation to the principle of responsibility which he had obtained. Any other idea of responsibility which he had ever heard, was too refined for common use. If a member from one part of the Union is to be the Representative of a part which does not elect him, agreeably to this fractional doctrine, he cannot be held in check or control by them; and the very reason that may make him hateful to them, may ingratiate him among those from whom he actually comes. Instead of cementing confidence, such a predominance given any one State, beyond what her numbers entitle her to, will sow discord and jealousy. He had an amendment ready to offer, which was, to strike out the words "within the several States," and to insert these words: "agreeably to a ratio of one member for every thirty thousand." He would vote against the motion, and against the principle on which it was founded, which, though not specified in the bill, was obvious, and take the liberty of moving his amendment, if the motion now before the Committee failed, which he hoped would be the case.

Mr. BOURNOR said, he could have wished that, as the House had gone into a Committee of the Whole, the gentleman [Mr. MURRAY] had brought forward a proposition, as he is abundantly able to do, which would give the bill the consistency he wished for. He then entered into a defence of the proposition, and justified its friends from the charge of inconsistency. He had been in favor of forty thousand; if that had been agreed to, he should have applied it as it is now proposed in respect to thirty thousand. He replied to several objections, by explaining the Constitution.

Mr. BENSON moved an amendment as a substitute for Mr. VINING's proposition, expressly apportioning the representation on the aggregate number of the people of the United States. This he moved in conformity to the idea of Mr. MURRAY, who contended that there was no principle in the bill.

Mr. VINING, on this, withdrew his proposition. The debate was continued on Mr. BENSON's motion, and was finally negatived—33 to 24.

The Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 17.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Memorial from D. L. Morell, of the Island of St. Domingo, suggesting a plan for the civilization of the Indians; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On a motion made and seconded, Resolved, That it be a Standing Order of this House that, whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, the House shall be cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, and so continue during the reading of such communications, and during all debates and proceedings to be had thereon. And that, when the SPEAKER, or any other member, shall inform the House that he has communications to make, which he conceives ought to be kept secret, the House shall, in like manner, be cleared till the communication be made; the House shall then determine whether the matter communicated requires secrecy or not, and take order accordingly.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the first Enumeration; and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives, after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

A memorial and petition of sundry merchants of the State of North Carolina, engaged in commerce, previous to the late Revolution, was presented to the House and read, stating the peculiar hardships under which they labor, from the twofold causes of the operation of the fourth article of the Definitive Treaty of Peace, and so much of the act of Congress for funding the public debt, as accords the old Continental money, at the rate of one hundred dollars thereof, for one dollar specie; the former requiring them to pay their British debts in sterling money, with full interest to the present time, and the latter depriving them of all hope of indemnity, from the effects of depreciation and tender laws, to which they were exposed during the war, and praying relief. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven.

Mr. SENEY moved that the third and fourth sections, which provide for an apportionment of the representation on the Second Census, &c. should be struck out. This motion occasioned some debate, and was disagreed to.

The blank for the ratio of representation on the Second Census, was filled with "thirty thousand." The bill was then reported to the House with the amendments. These were taken into consideration, and severally agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON then moved to strike out the second section, which provides for a second enumeration in five years; and called the yeas and nays; which were taken, and stood as follow:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, John Brown, William Findley, William Barry Grove, Thomas Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Hillhouse, Andrew Hartley, Daniel Huger, John W. Kittera, John Laurance, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, John Vane, Samuel Sterrett, Thomas Sumpter, Abraham Venable, John Vining, Anthony Wayne, and Francis Willis—26.

Mr. SENEY renewed his motion for striking out the third and fourth sections, which respect the ratio of representation on the Second Census, and called for the yeas and nays; which were taken and stood as follow:

nathan Dayton, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, James Hillhouse, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, Samuel Livermore, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, John Page, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Joshua Seney, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Jonathan Sturges, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, and Thomas Tudor Tucker—25.

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Egbert Benson, John Brown, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Huger, John W. Kittera, John Laurance, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vane, Samuel Sterrett, Thomas Sumpter, William Smith, Samuel Tredwell, John Vining, Anthony Wayne, Abraham Venable, and Francis Willis—26.

On filling up the blank in the fourth section with "thirty thousand," the yeas and nays were taken and stood thus:

NAYS.—Robert Barnwell, Elias Boudinot, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, James Hillhouse, Israel Jacobs, Aaron Kitchell, John W. Kittera, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, Jonathan Sturges, and George Thatcher—22.

The other amendments to the said bill were then severally again read, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. LIVERMORE laid a motion on the table to the following purport: "That a committee should be appointed to report a bill authorizing the officers of the Treasury to settle the claim on the estate of General Greene, so as that the said estate may be indemnified from the claims against it, by virtue of his having become security for certain contractors, who furnished clothing and rations to the army of the United States, in the State of South Carolina."

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on a bill providing for the settlement of the claims of certain persons, under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established—Mr. W. SMITH in the Chair.

The object of this bill is, to admit the claims of such officers, soldiers, artificers, sailors, and marines, as may have been inevitably precluded from presenting them, within the times prescribed by the ordinances of the late Congress, dated the 2d November, 1785, and 23d July, 1787.

The Committee agreed to sundry amendments, which were reported. The House adopted several of them; others were proposed, but not decided on. Adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 21.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate disagree to the last, and agree to all the other amendments proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President." The Senate have also appointed a committee, jointly, with such committee as shall be appointed on the part of this House, to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in the present session, and what part of the business now depending may, without great inconvenience, be postponed to the next session, the proceedings may be so regulated as to close this session by the first Tuesday in April next.

Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. LARANCE, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. MACON, were appointed a committee on the part of this House, for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, &c.

The House then proceeded to reconsider their last amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President, in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President." Whereupon, the said amendment being read as follows:

Strike out the ninth section in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

And in lieu thereof, insert:

"And be it further enacted, That, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of the State, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

A motion was made, and the question being put, that the House do recede from the said amendment—it passed in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry Benjamin Goodhue, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John W. Kittera, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, William Vane Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Israel Smith, William Smith, Peter Sylvester, Thomas Tudor Tucker, and Jeremiah Wadsworth.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

An engrossed bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives, after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, was read the third time, and the blanks therein filled up; and, on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 16, as follows:

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House yesterday to the bill providing for the settlement of claims of persons under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established; and the same being read was agreed to. The said bill was then further amended, and together with the said amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

THE MILITIA BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States. The first section being read—

Mr. STURGES said, that he conceived some amendment was necessary to this section. It appears to consider the militia of the several States, as the militia of the Union; whereas the Constitution considers it as belonging to the respective States; that the States alone are to say of what description of persons the militia shall consist, and who shall be exempt from militia duty; Congress have only power to organize them, when thus designated. He therefore moved that the section which he considered as involving the principle he was opposed to.

Mr. SENEY observed, that the consequence of the gentleman's motion would be to render the power of Congress in organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, entirely nugatory.

Mr. BARNWELL enlarged on the ideas suggested by Mr. SENEY.

Mr. LIVERMORE made some general remarks on the terms used in the Constitution, to designate the power of Congress in respect to the militia. He contended that they were the most vague and indefinite that could possibly have been adopted. He agreed substantially with Mr. STURGEON. It is the militia of the several States that Congress have power to organize, and provide a mode of discipline for. It is not a militia to be formed, or created—it already exists. He therefore thought it best to leave it to the respective States to make their own militia laws.

Mr. BARNWELL observed, that the consequence of the gentleman's proposition would be a total want of uniformity in the militia, and a clashing from different militia systems. That it was in vain to expect an effective militia, except Congress should exercise the powers so expressly delegated to them in this respect.

Mr. BOBINOT observed, that from the experience Congress has had in the preceding sessions, of the difficulties attending this subject, he was fully of opinion that a plan of condonation alone would ever procure a passage through the Legislature for a militia bill. He adverted to the powers of Congress on this subject, and to those reserved to the States; to the latter, was expressly reserved the power of appointing the officers, and if they refuse to do it, there is no power in Congress to compel them. He therefore accorded with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STURGEON] in opinion that the law which Congress shall pass, must be very simple in its construction, and refer to as few objects as possible.

Mr. HILLHOUSE controverted the sentiments advanced by Mr. BOBINOT. He said the natural inference was, that Congress possesses no power at all in the case; for, if what that gentleman advances is true, no provision that Congress can possibly make will be of the least avail. He contended that Congress, by virtue of the powers vested in them, are empowered to organize the militia, to say what descriptions, ages, &c., the militia shall consist of; to form them into companies, corps, regiments, &c.; and that when this is done, the States are to appoint the officers; for, previous to such an organization, the States cannot exercise the power of appointing the officers. He hoped, therefore, that the motion would not be agreed to; but that the Committee would proceed in the matter agreeable to the express powers of the Constitution, and when they came to the section making exemptions, he hoped they would make them on a very liberal scale, that the militia should consist of such persons as would be capable of rendering service.

Mr. WADSWORTH opposed the motion. He observed that the subject had been managed in such manner, as to pare the bill now under consideration, down to such an inadequate, defective system, that he did not feel much interested in its fate. Still he hoped the motion would not prevail, for he considered it as better than no provision at all. He said that the militia of the several States exist at the present moment more by general consent of the persons forming them in the several States, than in consequence of any laws of the particular States. The people in several States already avow the sentiment, that they think that Congress alone has the power to form the militia.

Mr. SENOWICK enlarged on the ideas of Mr. WADSWORTH. He further remarked that the amendment proposed would operate extremely unequal, and would defeat the public expectations of an efficient military defence, such an one as was consistent with a free Government.

Mr. STURGEON supported his motion. He was surprised to hear gentlemen express their apprehensions that we should have no militia at all. Adverting to the Constitution, he explained what he considered the meaning of organizing, &c. It simply relates to forming, arming, and arranging in a particular way, those materials which are furnished by the militia laws of the several States. In reply to the objections derived from the inattention and aversion of the States, to such requisitions as Congress may make, he said it was not to be supposed that the States would be so inattentive to the means of their own preservation, as to neglect their duty in this respect.

Mr. NILES supported the motion. Mr. MURRAY observed, that in no particular point of view was the people to be considered as united for a general purpose, more than in that of the general defence. The militia, contemplated in the Constitution, certainly does not mean an existing militia; for many of the States have no militia nor militia laws; and therefore the clause must respect a militia to be formed or created. He enlarged on the necessity and wisdom of the provision. The appointment of the officers he considered as being properly left in the power of the States.

The motion was negatived.

A motion by Mr. FITZSIMONS, to exempt persons who are not able to arm and equip themselves, from any penalty on that account, while that disability continues, occasioned some debate. Mr. SUMPTER entered into a general consideration of the subject. He denied that Congress had any right to interfere with the regulations of the several States in respect to their militia; their whole power respects only the calling the militia into actual service in cases of invasion, insurrection, or rebellion; and when thus called into service, they may provide for the organizing and arranging them in companies, corps, and battalions; and it is the duty of the General Government then to provide them with the means of defence; but they have no right to say that the militia, previous to being thus called out, shall be at the expense of arming themselves. He hoped the bill would take a different direction, and that Congress would not so far interfere in this business as to designate the persons who shall bear arms, and to say how they shall be armed. It seems to be the opinion of some gentlemen, according to the observations which have fallen from them, that the militia service shall be imposed on a comparatively small part of the citizens; and this inequality is to be increased by obliging those persons to be at the expense of arming themselves. He hoped that such injustice would not take place.

Mr. NILES, adverting to the Constitution, observed, that it appeared to him that a provision for arming the militia was reserved to the States, so far as it respects the common defence. He considered the requisition in the bill as operating like a capitation tax; and this species of tax, he observed, was to be assessed only in a certain way, agreeably to a particular clause in the Constitution. He concluded by moving that the clause in the bill which contained this provision for arming, should be struck out.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. FITZSIMONS withdrew his motion, which provided for a certificate from two Justices of the Peace, to admit a substitute, which provides that they shall be excused, if, in the judgment of the commissioned officers to whose company they belong, they are not able to furnish themselves.

This substitute was adopted. Mr. KITCHELL moved that the clause should be struck out, which provides that the calibres of the guns should be of one bore. He observed that this provision was unnecessary, and in fact impossible to be complied with.

Mr. SUMPTER asked what was to be done with the arms which the militia now have in their hands. Are they to be thrown away? Besides, he thought the provision inconsistent with the actual state of the military force of the country, the laws for the regulation of which contemplate the enrolment of riflemen among the regular forces of the country. Adverting to the expense which would attend this provision, he observed it was almost totally impracticable to carry it into execution. He hoped it would not be agreed to, as it would involve an enormous and unnecessary expense.

Mr. MURRAY offered some similar remarks. He did not conceive that the excellency of the militia of the United States consisted in their being armed all with muskets of the same bore. He did not consider the bill in the light that some gentlemen appeared to do. It was, in his opinion, merely a provision to keep alive a military germ that shall, when occasion calls, spring up, and diffuse its influence among the people in such manner as to furnish the most competent means of defence.

Mr. WADSWORTH objected to the motion. He said this was one of the very few good regulations left in the bill, and to strike out this would render the militia a fallacious source of defence, and effectually destroy every idea of uniformity.

Mr. KITCHELL's motion was negatived. The motion to expunge the exemptions was seconded by Mr. DAYTON.

Mr. BOBINOT opposed it. He urged, in brief, the several reasons which were offered on a former occasion in support of the exemptions.

Mr. DAYTON said, it appeared to him unreasonable to exempt persons from militia duty, and from paying an equivalent, too, who, from their station in life, are best qualified to pay those equivalents. It appeared to him to be unjust and impolitic.

Mr. J. SMITH opposed the motion. He observed that the experience of the Eastern States, where the militia is on at least as respectable a footing as in any part of the Union, was against the spirit of the motion. There various exemptions are made, and the prejudices of the people are in favor of the practice. Many exemptions are necessary, and many characters in society cannot, and ought not to be compelled to bear arms—Ministers of the Gospel, &c. To combat these prejudices, would be little better than attacking a windmill. Several other gentlemen spoke on the subject. The motion was finally negatived.

The third section being read—Mr. J. SMITH moved that these words, after the word "companies," "in such manner as the President of the United States shall see proper to direct," should be struck out. He observed, that, as the President of the United States has, by the Constitution, no command over the militia till they are called into actual service, he cannot, with any propriety, be invested with this power. It lies with the Legislatures of the several States to make the provision requisite in this case. The Executives of the several States must be more competent to determine the number of regiments, &c., into which their respective militia should be divided.

Mr. LAURANCE said, the Constitution, by investing Congress with the power of organizing the militia, appears necessarily to have included the power in question.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, he was in favor of striking out the words, on two accounts. He did not know how the power could be exercised, and he was opposed to retaining phrases which, however sounding and pompous they may be, contained no meaning. This he conceived to be the case in respect to the words in question. They propose to invest a power in the President, which I do not see how he can exercise; or, if he can, certainly not with so much propriety as the Legislatures of the several States.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was opposed to striking out the words. He said he could conceive of no disadvantage which would result from giving the President the power of making a uniform arrangement of the militia. It appeared to be necessary, in order to his being able to determine how to call them into service, should public exigencies require it, in such proportions and drafts as shall be most equal to the people, and most conducive to the public service.

Mr. PAX observed, that it appeared necessary to retain the clause, in order to effecting the object of uniformity; for, if the power is invested in fifteen different bodies, or individuals, it cannot be expected that they will ever agree in one uniform plan. Nor did he conceive that this regulation would, in the least, interfere with the essential powers of the several States. He was as much adverse as any man from abridging any of the powers of the several States, but this regulation would not interfere with those powers in any manner whatever.

Mr. SENEY was in favor of striking out. He thought it was a sufficient reason to reject the clause, but the President could not be supposed so competent to the business as the authority of the several States.

Mr. SUMPTER was in favor of striking out. The scope of his observations was, that the United States have power only to say how the militia shall be organized, but it must be left to the several States to carry the plan into execution.

Mr. LAURENCE stated the difficulties which would result from the want of uniformity, in case of the militia being called into actual service.

Mr. NILES observed, that the relative boundaries of towns, States, and districts, rendered the uniformity contended for impracticable, and therefore the clause is nugatory. A great variety, as to numbers, in the companies and regiments of the Continental Army, actually existed during the late war, and yet no difficulty occurred from that circumstance.

The motion for striking out was carried. It was then moved to insert: "In such manner as the Legislatures of the respective States shall direct." This was agreed to.

Mr. GILMAN moved that the clause in the fourth section, which provides that the militia shall be taken from the line, and the words "with the rank of Major" should be struck out. He observed, that, in the regular service, on the principles of economy, this arrangement takes place; but he conceived this would be unnecessary in the militia, if not injurious to the service.

This amendment was agreed to. The sixth section, which specifies the times of mustering and training the militia, says that the artillery, light infantry, troops of horse, &c., shall rendezvous four times a year, and the rest of the militia twice a year.

Mr. J. SMITH rose to inquire the reason of the distinction between the companies.

Mr. BARNWELL moved to add a proviso, authorizing the States to pass laws enjoining musters as often as they may see proper.

Mr. BOURNOR answered Mr. J. SMITH's inquiry. He said the object was to form a nursery of officers for the militia, whenever detachments shall be suddenly called into actual service.

Mr. J. SMITH objected to Mr. BARNWELL's proviso. He conceived that the States already fully possessed this power.

The proviso, after further debate, was negatived, and the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

An engrossed bill providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom were referred the Message from the President of the United States, of the eighth of this month, and a Letter from the Secretary of State accompanying the same, together with an account of John Brown Cutting, against the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying a copy of the laws adopted and published by the Governor of Charleston, for the payment of eight thousand seven hundred and forty-three pounds, fifteen shillings and sixpence, sterling money, being the condition of said bond:

"And whereas, on the first day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, the balance of principal and interest of said bond, being then eight thousand six hundred and eighty-eight pounds six shillings sterling, was paid by the said General Greene: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the United States shall indemnify the estate of the said General Greene for the said sum last mentioned, and the interest thereof: Provided, The Executors of the said General Greene shall account for a sum, being about two thousand pounds, be the same more or less, received of John Ferris, one of the partners of the said Banks and Company, to be in part of the indemnification aforesaid; and also shall make over, for the use of the United States, all mortgages, bonds, covenants, or other counter-securities whatsoever, now due, which were obtained by the said General Greene in his lifetime, from the said Banks and Company, on account of his being surety for them as aforesaid, to be used for in the name of the said executors, for the use of the United States."

Ordered, That the said resolution be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said resolution; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 23.

Mr. BOURNOR, from the committee to whom were referred sundry petitions of the tanners of

New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

UNPAID BALANCES.

On motion that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be laid before this House a statement of the balances remaining unpaid, if any, which may have been due by individuals to the United States previous to the fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and whether any, and what, steps have been taken to recover the same; and also a statement of the sundry sums of public money which may have been intrusted to individuals, previous to the said fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and have not been accounted for."

It was moved and seconded that the said resolution be committed; and, on the question for commitment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 27, as follows:

Ordered, That the said resolution be committed to Mr. BOURNOR, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. GERRY, Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, and Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island.

Against the resolution, as originally proposed by Mr. MACON, it was objected that it was informal; that the law instituting the Treasury Department had made every competent provision in the case; that the duty of the Comptroller was particularly designated; and that, if he has been deficient, the proper mode would be to call him to an account, and if found remiss he should be impeached. The resolution contained an imputation on that officer, and yet no gentleman had come forward with any direct charges against him. It was further said, that information had been received from the Comptroller on this subject; that a compliance with the resolution would operate against the interest of the United States.

The officers of the Treasury are proceeding in this business; no charge of remissness has been adduced; they have already made greater progress in settling the old accounts, since the new Government came into operation, than had been done in many years previous thereto; and their investigations receive no interruption but what arises from the more important business of the present Government.

It was inquired what would be the effect of this resolution. It would bring forward one thousand or fifteen hundred names of persons apparently debtors to the United States; but the principal part of whom were either creditors, or did not owe the public one farthing. What is intended to be done as a consequence of this disclosure? Is it designed that suits shall be instituted against these persons? That would induce an unproductive expense to an amount which cannot now be estimated. The Comptroller is empowered by law to sue every delinquent; but is he to exercise no discretion in the discharge of his duty? It had been stated, as a reason for adopting the resolution, that its object was to ascertain to what amount these balances, if any, would supercede the necessity of additional taxes; but it was asked, would the Government be justified in assessing one farthing less on account of these balances, which must be considered in a great measure as fictitious? It was further said, that it was utterly impossible for the officers of the Treasury to make out the statement in question during the present session.

In support of the resolution, it was said that it did not imply, either directly or indirectly, any imputation against the Comptroller—the House has undoubtedly a right to call on any of its officers for information. It is an opinion abroad, that there are large sums due from individuals, and the public has a right to be satisfied that the proper steps have been taken to recover those sums. Those steps may have been pursued, but it is not known that they have; further, it was said, that this information was necessary in order to be able to form a competent judgment of the state of the public accounts; that the information in question, the House had a most undoubted right to receive; and that it was a very strange idea, indeed, to suppose that it contained any reflection on the Comptroller, or any other officer of the Treasury; it was further said, that no difficulties ought to deter the House from going into the investigation; it was immaterial whose names were brought forward in consequence, the balances due to the public ought to be known. That similar objections to those now offered will always lie against going into this investigation, and in proportion to the urgency of the inquiry will be the strength and ingenuity of those objections. With respect to the disclosure of names, it was observed, that the truth once known would set every man's character in a just point of light; the inquiry, so far from proving injurious to such characters, appears to be the most direct method to do away the of public money between the 1st of October and the 31st of December, 1791, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. LAURENCE, and Mr. AMES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering his report on the petition of the executors of Edward Carnes, deceased; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A memorial of the merchants of New York trading to India and China was presented to the House and read, praying the patronage and encouragement of the General Government, either by prohibiting foreigners from interfering in the said trade, or making a greater difference than now exists between duties on goods imported into the United States immediately from Asia and those brought by the way of Europe.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, from the committee appointed to examine whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the acts establishing the Treasury and War Departments, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

PETITION OF JOHN CHURCHMAN.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Churchman. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said report, in the words following:

"That the said Churchman, having pursued his inquiries into his theory of the variation of the magnetic needle, has found a number of observations, made in different parts of the world, which confirm his hypothesis; that, animated by this circumstance, and applauded for his ingenuity by several learned societies in Europe, which have looked up to him for the prosecution of his plan for establishing the truth of his theory, he has been emboldened to ask again the aid of the General Government of the United States to enable him to gratify the expectations of the philosophical world, and to put his theory to an immediate and the strictest scrutiny. The committee are free to declare it as their opinion, that Mr. Churchman's ingenuity, displayed in proposing and supporting his theory, and his labors in prosecuting his examination thereof, entitle him to the applause of the enlightened world, and to the encouragement and support of his country. And it is the opinion of the committee that, as a more perfect knowledge of the laws of magnetism, and the variation of the magnetic needle, is greatly to be desired, as it would furnish a ready means of adjusting and preventing disputes respecting the boundaries of ancient surveys of land, and of correcting many inaccuracies in geographical charts, and in the journals of the courses and distances run by vessels at sea, every possible encouragement ought to be given to all persons who, by their theories, confirmed by observations, contribute towards the perfecting this desirable knowledge; and that, as the United States are peculiarly interested in whatever can adjust or prevent disputes between their citizens, and can improve geography and

"And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, from time to time, to call into service, and for such periods as he may deem requisite, such number of cavalry as, in his judgment, may be necessary for the protection of the frontiers: Provided, That the non-commissioned officers shall not be allowed more than one dollar per day, nor the privates more than seventy-five cents per day, each person finding his horse, arms, and accoutrements, and at his own risk, and twenty-five cents per day in lieu of rations and forage, provided he furnish himself therewith."

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

FRIDAY, March 2.

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts" was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for reducing the rates of postage on newspapers; and that Mr. GERRY, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. FINDLEY, be the said committee.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for finishing the light-house on Bald Head, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in North Carolina; and that Mr. GROVE, Mr. KEY, and Mr. BARNWELL, be the said committee.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the modification of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," conformably to the report of the Joint Committee of Conference.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported several amendments thereto. Ordered, That the said report do lie on the table.

A memorial and petition of the Directors of the Ohio Company of Associates was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will grant them such terms and conditions for the completion of their contract with the late Board of Treasury, and for confirming their title to the tract of land then purchased, as will relieve them from the danger, difficulty, and distress, in which the said company are now involved, from causes which have arisen since the purchase, and which were, then wholly unforeseen.

[H. OF R.]

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. BENSON, Mr. LEARNED, and Mr. BALDWIN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

SATURDAY, March 3.

A petition of Timothy Pickering, Quartermaster General, praying that the officers of the Treasury may be authorized to apply a certain sum of money, heretofore granted to discharge claims against his Department, to the payment of demands of certain public creditors in the State of New York, who the petitioner conceives are, from their peculiar circumstances, unjustly precluded by the act of limitation. Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, reported a "bill for enrolling and licensing ships and vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same."

Mr. FINDLEY presented nine petitions from the inhabitants of Chester county, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying a revision of the Excise law.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments offered by the Senate, to the "bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions." Some they agreed to, and disagreed to others.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, together with a copy of the Return made to him of the number of the Inhabitants within the District of South Carolina.

A Report from the Secretary of the Treasury respecting compensations to the Commissioners of Loans, was read and referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. B. BOURNE, MERCER, and TUCKER.

MONDAY, March 5.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying a copy of the laws adopted and published by the Governor and Judges of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee to whom was referred the petition of George Turner, one of the Judges of the said Territory.

Mr. GROVE, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for finishing the light-house on Baldhead, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina; which was received and read twice and committed.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain widows, orphans, invalids, and other persons," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating to the House the translation of a Letter from the King of France, announcing his acceptance of the Constitution of that Kingdom. These were read and laid on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they insist on all the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and invalid pensions; and propose a conference on the subjects of disagreement.

A committee of conference was appointed on the disagreement between the House and Senate, respecting the bill to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and invalid pensions. Committee, Messrs. LIVERMORE, MURRAY, KIRCHELL. The amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the relief of certain widows, &c., were read, and laid on the table.

MILITIA BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House to the bill more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States; and the same being severally read, some were agreed to, and others disagreed to. The said bill was then further amended; and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

TUESDAY, March 6.

A memorial of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina was presented to the House and read, praying to be reimbursed for the value of certain tracts of land in the Western Territory of the said State, which were a donation to the said University from Benjamin Smith, Esquire, and have been since ceded to the Indians, by the Commissioners of the United States, at the Treaty of Hopewell.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

A petition of Andrew Jackson was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for his services as Attorney for the District of Miro, in the Territory South of the Ohio. Referred to the Attorney General, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

MILITIA BILL.

An engrossed bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States, was read the third time, and the blanks therein filled up; and, on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 27; as follows:

THURSDAY, March 8.

A bill to amend the act, entitled, “An act for the Encouragement of Learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,” was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

A bill to enable John Churchman to prosecute certain observations and discoveries relative to the Northern magnetic point, was read the second time, and ordered to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday se’night.

Mr. SENECA, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial and petition of the Directors of the Ohio Company of Associates, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

A petition of Henry Laurens, of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, praying that a claim presented, and referred to the Secretary of War, at the last session of Congress, and by him reported on, may now be considered and decided on.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. SMITH, of S. C., Mr. WAITE, and Mr. CLARK; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

ADDITIONAL SUPPLIES.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, in the words following:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House his opinion of the best mode for raising the additional supplies requisite for the ensuing year.”

Mr. SENECA said, that when the law was passed constituting the Department of the Treasury, and making it the duty of the Secretary to report to the Legislature plans for the management and improvement of the revenue, he had fondly indulged the hope that a great principle in the administration of the Government had been so far settled that it would not have been called in question at so early a period. This principle he then and still understood to be, that a great officer should, by appointment for that purpose and an adequate salary, be responsible to the community to produce to the consideration of the National Legislature, such systematic arrangements in the intricate business of finance, as should give the highest assurance of the support of public credit, with the least possible burden to the citizens of America. That if this great principle remained still to be determined, he ardently wished that we might profit by the experience of other nations, and by our own: that he knew of no nation that suffered under the weight of a public debt, but had found it indispensable to its welfare to appoint some officer, whose duty it should be to superintend this important branch of business; and that, without such appointment, it was impossible for him to conceive that an orderly administration of the finances could be effected. It was not long since, that all America had attempted to provide for the public exigencies, by the undigested schemes of legislating financiers. The effects are remembered by all; the revenue was incomparably less productive, and yet the people infinitely more burdened than at present. These facts would reader believe that experience was the best guide to the well-founded political conclusions. But, on the other hand, if gentlemen were disposed to calculate on the data afforded by imagination, and to build systems on arguments a priori, not only unsanctioned by experiment, but in opposition to all experience, we might render the debts we owed—which had been justly styled the price of liberty, and for which therefore we were under the highest obligation to provide—an intolerable burden. For he would venture to pronounce, that the measures which would result from such a desultory mode of procedure, would create grievous expectations on our constituents, disappoint the expectations of Government, and prove inadequate to the support of public credit.

By these observations, he did not mean to derogate from the responsibility of the character of the House collectively, or of any individual member of it. There might be many who had sufficient talents ably to preside in the management of our finances, provided their minds were confined to the contemplation of that subject alone. But it should be remembered, that while separated in the recess of the Legislature, the avocations of professions, or other business, left to most of the members but little leisure for the investigation of political questions; that while in session, they were obliged to pay attention to every subject of legislation committed to the National Government. That, considering the limited faculties of the human mind, he did not think gentlemen should feel themselves wounded in reputation, by the supposition that they were not, collectively, minutely acquainted with every branch of science, a knowledge of which might be involved in the subjects of our legislation. Without such an extent of information and science, a man might be an excellent legislator; otherwise the business of popular legislation must altogether cease, or be very badly managed. It would not produce the smallest usefulness in his mind, to have it universally known that he pretended not to the deep knowledge of jurisprudence of the Attorney General, the acquaintance of the Secretary of State with the political interests and relations of the community, or the profound knowledge of the Secretary of the Treas-survey of the intricate subjects of finance. Yet he felt some degree of confidence in the ability which he possessed, of judging of the expediency of adopting such measures as those officers should recommend. He observed, that the House, ever since the organization of the Executive Department, had conducted as if convinced of the justness of this reasoning, by their frequent references to the Heads of these Departments. That, particularly, when it had been suggested that the Judicial system required amendment, the subject had been referred to the consideration of the Attorney General. That when the commerce of the country came under deliberation, it was referred to the Secretary of State. That these subjects comprehended the most important and dearest interests of the people. That he heartily concurred in those references, and would take the liberty to add, that they had the support of the gentlemen who were now so strenuous in opposition to the present motion. That if the House was then right, those would not be wrong who were in favor of this question. He observed, that gentlemen, in the two cases which in argument they had supported, had given very opposite opinions of the collective character of the members of the House. When they were considering them solely devising the ways and means necessary to supply the deficiency of the revenue, they gave them all the qualities of profound financiers; but when they were to consider the reports of the Secretary, they became at once transformed into resistless dupes, incapable of manly investigation, and quietly sailing down the stream of Ministerial influence. Did gentlemen feel, in the latter instance, the want of that independence of spirit which is necessary to enable them to investigate and decide for themselves? If so, they would want much of that greatness of character which would enable them, in the former case, to act for the public benefit. It appeared, by what gentlemen had said during the course of the debate, that members were not to be absolutely restricted from receiving every species of information on this interesting subject from the man who was constitutionally selected as the best qualified to give it, and amply paid by the public to devote all his time and talents to understand and communicate respecting it. It was, however, curious to observe the narrow limits within which that information was to be restricted, and the incomprehensible mode by which it was to be obtained.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MANLSON,] who had heretofore approved the references which he had mentioned, to the Attorney General and to the Secretary of State, and who had given efficient aid in making it by law the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report plans for the management and improvement of the revenue—had, on this occasion, taken some pains to show the consistency of his political conduct, by attempting to prove that management and improvement implied neither project nor appropriation. This gentleman had given in detail the several proceedings which ought to take place to obtain on one hand the benefit of the knowledge of the Secretary, and to maintain on the other the indepen-dency of the House. Thus, according to his plan, was the business to be pursued. The House was, in the first place, to call on the Secretary for a state of facts; it was then to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to form opinions; these opinions were then to be referred to the Secretary, for him to report respecting them a systematic arrangement. Let this scheme, so far as it is intelligible, be examined. First, the House is to obtain from the Secretary a state of facts. The House had been left to conjecture to what subjects those facts were to relate. We already knew the deficiency to be provided for—the subjects of revenue, such as were pre-occupied, and such as still remained untouched; we also knew how far those which had been occupied were productive. These facts were already known; we must not receive any opinions or argumentative deductions respecting them; this would go in destruction of the independence and purity of the House, and some gentlemen seemed to suppose, to the subversion of liberty. The facts, whatever they might be, were to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, who, as financiers, were to form opinions respecting them; and those opinions were to be sent to the Secretary for a systematic arrangement, and this systematic arrangement was to be made without suggesting any opinion. How this was to be done the gentlemen had not been pleased to declare. We only knew that no opinions were to be recommended to the adoption of the House. This was the dreadful enemy to our independence and freedom, that was to be avoided with the utmost caution. He himself had hitherto supposed, that a systematic arrangement for the execution of a complicated and intricate subject, could not be made without suggesting many opinions. That he believed this singular, and as yet inexplicable, scheme of forming systematic arrangements without opinions, would be as curious as it would be new in practice.

He said, no gentleman could doubt but that the plans of the Minister would find their way into the House, if regularly introduced, as they had hitherto been. The officer, whoever he might be, would be responsible at least in reputation to America and to the world, which alone would form the strongest motives to industry and integrity in the various plans he should recommend. That it appeared to him, that gentlemen who so strenuously opposed the present motion, would, if they should succeed in their wishes, destroy most of the benefits intended by the institution of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and wholly screen the officer from every species of responsibility.

Mr. GOODHUE supported the reference. He generally remarked, that in his opinion the most eligible mode to be adopted for raising the supplies on the present occasion would be by way of loan. He then entered into a consideration of the various objects which ought to be within the knowledge of every man who pretends to manage the finances of a country. He did not think it any derogation from the character of any member of the House to suppose that they were less competent to a thorough investigation of fiscal arrangements than an individual who had made the subject the particular object of his study and attention. The mischievous consequences of committing these arrangements to numbers, had been severely felt in some of the States; in the present case the House does not, however, commit its judgment—it is at liberty to approve or reject—and the measure, in fact, is only taking the best means to get the best information.

Mr. PAGE—I shall always vote against a motion for applying to the Secretary of the Treasury for information respecting the means of procuring the sums of money necessary for the exigencies of Government. It is no argument to me to be told, that the act which established the Department, at the head of which that officer is placed, authorizes that motion. That act may be plead as obligatory on the Secretary to reply to such inquiry when made by Congress, but not to induce this House to make such inquiry. When that act, which is now urged in justification of the motion before the House, was under the consideration of the House which formed it, I raised my feeble voice against it. I endeavored to show, that the powers given to an officer, who was appointed by the President and Senate, and removable by the President alone, were such as were utterly incompatible with the principles of the Constitution, and perhaps with the letter of it; as that does not permit even the independent Senate, the Representatives of the Legislatures of the several States, to originate a money bill. I remarked, that if the bill passed, it would verify the predictions of the anti-Federalists, as they were called, and would alarm many friends of the new Government. I observed that the practice of the former Congress, which was adduced as a precedent for such applications to the Secretary for his statements and reports, was not a case in point; as the Congress, under the Confederation, was looked upon as a mere diplomatic body, whose acts were revised, approved, or rejected by the State Assemblies—which shows that it was immaterial who planned the schemes of finance—whence information was derived, or who drew the acts of the then Congress, as they were not, as the laws of the present Congress are, paramount to the laws of all the States. I contended, sir, that it was the peculiar duty of this House, to originate money bills, and to devise ways and means, as they are called. I am still most decidedly of the same opinion; and I think with the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. FITZSIMONS] that such a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury is a dereliction of our duty, and an abandonment of the trust reposed in us; and that many other references must have the appearance of an unbecoming indolence. I am also of opinion with the member from Georgia, [Mr. BALDWIN,] that if ever we make a stand, it should be on this ground. I will add, that it is high time to make that stand. For a bill having passed, which was opposed as dangerous to the Constitution, and utterly incompatible with the principles of a free Government, and indeed as inconsistent with the plain construction, and I may say the very letter of our own Constitution; and that bill being now appealed to as a justification of a motion which can be supported on no other principles, but such as may be used to subvert our Government, and to introduce a Monarchy, as unlimited as that lately abolished in France; for surely if more wisdom can be found in a few Heads of Departments, than in the whole Representative body of the people—and if those Heads can be made responsible, whilst the Representatives are free from responsibility, and despatch and energy can be obtained without the expense of a Congress, or of this House at least, I see not why the people might not make a favorite President as absolute as the Kings of France have been, and call on Congress, like the Parliaments of Paris, only to register his edicts. I say, as this is the case, it is high time to make a stand. But we are told, that the Heads of Departments are recognised by the Constitution, and the business now required of one of them sanctioned by law; and we are also told of precedents establishing and authorizing this mode of proceeding. It is surely, then, high time for every member who views that law and such proceedings under it, in the light I do, to join with the member from Georgia, and make a stand, as he calls it. And I trust, sir, that rather than suffer that law to be thus resorted to, they will unite to amend or repeal it.

I repeat it, sir, here we should make a stand; for however well intended such measures may be, and the arguments in support of them, their tendency is mischievous, and ought to be opposed by every friend to a free Government.

The bills establishing the Departments of Government have strong Monarchical features; and have too often led Congress into the steps of Monarchical Governments. The Republican part of the British Government rely on a Committee of Ways and Means; the Heads of Departments being members of the House of Commons, are always forward to take the lead in the plans or projects of the Crown; and they have so ingeniously involved the plans of finance, that few understand the mysterious business, and therefore it is in the Minister's hands alone. Sir, the House of Commons always severely scrutinize their plans, and are not so obsequious to their Ministers, as some gentlemen are disposed to be to our Secretaries.

But what would Englishmen say, if their Parliament were to pass such a bill as this now referred to; and should call on a man, not a member of either House, but appointed by the King, with the advice indeed of the House of Lords, removable however by the King alone, to lay before the House of Commons a plan of ways and means? Would the people of England be satisfied with the strange story of his responsibility? And of his superior abilities? But what is this responsibility so much talked of? The President may dismiss the Secretary from his office, or this House may impeach him; but when the President and Congress both are his accomplices, who will dismiss or who impeach, and where then is his responsibility? And what is to become of the people's rights, if this be the case, and this House be not accountable to the people for its acts? as a member said.

But, sir, I will not ask what Englishmen would say on such an occasion, I will tell you what Americans have said. They have said that, under this boasted act, you might as well apply to the President in the first instance, as to any Head of Department under him, were it not for their virtue; and that, at the rate Congress have proceeded in some cases, their rights are at the mercy of Departments. But here we are asked, if we have not wisdom enough to reject an improper plan, how we could be supposed capable of devising a good one? To this, sir, I shall only reply, that when we have done our best, we shall have discharged our duty; and our bills will at least be framed according to our Constitution; and the doubting members may ask the opinion of the Secretary, if they please. One member endeavored to ridicule Republican jealousy; I thank God, although I am a Republican, I know where to direct my jealousy, and where when to repose confidence; when to strengthen Government and when to restrain it.

We were asked indeed, Are you afraid of truth, and unwilling to receive instruction? I answer, No. Truth is our great object, and just information our only aim; but to get at truth, respecting the most likely means of raising a revenue, with as little inconvenience as possible to our constituents, was, I conceive, a principal object in the view of the framers of our Constitution, when they instituted this House of Representatives. In this House alone I should search for truth, respecting this important question; from the Representatives of the States I should expect to receive all the necessary information respecting it; and if the Secretary be possessed of vouchers for further information, the House should call for it. In the Committee of the Whole, every inquiry should be made—resolutions be proposed, examined, amended, and when maturely considered and approved by the House, where all the further information which the Heads of Departments can give may be called for, our business would be done. I say this is the way for Congress to get at information, and to arrive at truth; but to apply, in the first instance, to a single individual must be improper—to an individual circumstance as the Heads of Departments are—who are removable by the President—liable, from the infirmity of human nature, to local attachments, to imposition, even of ingenuity and good sense; I mean the imposition of their own theoretical reasoning, borrowed from writers on Governments not altogether resembling our own. Whatever he should propose, would come with such advantages as to require much time, and perhaps more penetration than this House could readily command, to see through and reject, if improper; but some, I know, are of opinion that a Secretary may venture to propose what no member would be hardy enough to mention. Some have doubted whether the Funding System, the Assumption, or the Excise, could have been introduced by any other means. If this be true, and these schemes be such as in the issue of them shall be attended with happy consequences, so far as we have gone, such applications to the Secretary were right; but it is unmanly, and unbecoming the Representatives of freemen, to act in this manner, to adopt measures which we dare not propose, and to applaud them because they were planned by this or that Secretary. It is ungenerous to hold up a Secretary as responsible for errors adopted by Congress; and it is unreasonable to impose upon him a task which, although our peculiar duty to perform, we shrink from. The multitude of references already made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the necessary length of some of his reports, leave him no leisure to attend properly to the different branches of his own Department.

But what information do we ask? We know the estimates of expenses for the present year. We have estimates of the probable amount of the revenue; and we have called for a Report of the amount of surpluses, if any, in the Treasury. We can then, as well as the Secretary, determine whether any additional revenue will be necessary; and if so, we alone ought to devise the ways and means of raising it. If despatch is necessary, it is better to determine here at once what is to be done, than to apply to the Secretary, whose plans we may, after long debates, reject. As to the Secretary of the Treasury, I acknowledge his abilities; I know too that some of his Reports do honor to his heart, as well as to his head; his gallant behaviour in the late war has commanded my highest respect and esteem; but I owe too much respect to our country to agree to the resolution before you. I wish, therefore, that this House would refer only such cases to him, as they cannot decide on without official information in his hands; and that, in the present case, the House would, in a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, take under their consideration the means of raising the supplies which may be found necessary for the support of Government, and protection of the frontiers.

Mr. STEELE observed that a motion to bring forward a bill for repealing the law establishing the Treasury Department, would afford a proper opportunity for the display of that oratory which the House had been entertained with yesterday and to-day; but on the present occasion, he conceived the remarks were not in point. He observed that it was customary with the first Congress to make references of subjects of this nature to the Secretary of the Treasury; the present Congress has done the same, and he had heard of nothing that suggests a sufficient reason to deviate from the practice. All the Reports that have been received have been attended to, investigated, and scrutinized with a zeal and diligence which have not marked the conduct of the House on the Reports from Select Committees. He instanced several Reports of the latter description, to which little attention had been paid. The independence of the House has been manifested in respect to Reports from Executive officers, even from the highest; and he trusted that, on all occasions, the House would continue to support its independence of character. He should always rejoice in an opportunity to oppose every Report from the Heads of Departments, when his judgment did not approve of them.

He contrasted the present conduct of those opposed to the motion, with their conduct on the bill providing for the defence of the frontiers. Every one who now opposes this proposition, was in favor of almost an implicit adoption of the Report from the Secretary of War. He opposed that report; but these gentlemen now oppose the most obvious mode of devising ways and means to defray an enormous expense, brought on the country by that very bill.

Mr. MURRAY observed, that, on such a question, his object should be to pursue what appeared to him the wisest mode of raising taxes. In agreeing, however, with the resolution and its reference, he could neither see danger in the precedent, nor surrender of constitutional right in the consequences. As to the privilege of originating money bills, when ways and means are to be sought for, his first object should be, to gain all the information the delicacy of the case demanded. The duty of exploring the resources of a country, as yet untried in many of its objects of taxation, was certainly the business of the House of Representatives; but why they should refuse to themselves an opportunity of gaining additional knowledge beyond what the leisure of any one here, or the abilities of few could collect, was extraordinary. He wished for a reference to the Secretary, in the first instance, because it would not very well comport with the dignity of the House to refer to him in the second instance. If, on trial, there should appear either a crudity or a conflicting of systems; and if, as would most probably be the case, partiality in the mover of any undebated set of resolutions, should show itself, the House must either make the most of the plans proposed, or, in the very last resort, call on the Officer of Government to suggest his opinion on the subject. The subject was extremely intricate; but part of the intricacy of taxation and finance was removed by the well-arranged order in which, he presumed, the documents relative to the Department were preserved. An act of Congress has already delineated the duties of the various Departments. To the Secretary of the Treasury, it belonged to collect information respecting the objects of taxation; to invent or adopt, and propose schemes by which the revenues were to be improved; to digest ideas on the political economy of the country, and to superintend its finances. In such a Department, he must think that a mass of information existed on the various resources of this country, and their probable productiveness, which was not necessarily to be expected elsewhere. He wished to avail himself of this information, on which he would exercise his right of judging, altering, or rejecting; and he wished to obtain it in the mode most congenial with his own mind, in an open, responsible communication to the whole House. He was certain that, though in no habits of intimacy himself, that could justify a private communication with the Secretary, nor warrant from the Secretary an unsolicited opinion to him, the opinions and ideas of the Secretary would, in some way or other, most assuredly find their way into the House. He wished to see no Ministerial out-door influence. The whole influence of superior judgment, and of well-digested opinion, he did not fear. On the contrary, that superiority was the only one to which could bow; and the only way in which the unmixed benefit of such an influence can be felt, was that way in which the law respecting the Heads of Departments contemplated the subject. From this mode of communicating all the knowledge of the Treasury Department, two benefits would be derived: the Secretary would send to us his best opinions on the subject, and in a way of which the whole House and the public itself could avail themselves in forming a judgment; and private influence, partially and irresponsibly given to individual members, would be rendered useless. He begged leave to remark, that the objection to this mode, that the power and right was in the House of Representatives to originate money bills, could not have much weight. The House of Representatives, of right, and by the Constitution, were properly constituted the sole origin of money bills; but this reference does not deny the right, nor can it weaken its operation. A bill does not originate till the House has agreed to some principles or resolutions, or a committee reports a bill by order. Principles then established by vote, resolutions, or leave, are the only ways in which, in a Legislative sense, any thing can be known to this Government to originate in the work of legislation. He who has not a seat here, of whom, for the sake of multiplied information, we require controllable opinion, does no more originate the legislative work of the House, than the author of a work on finance, from whose opinions we form a scheme of revenue, can be said to tax the people. There is certainly this good attending a reference in such cases: a greater chance for simplicity in the system of finance, and greater stability. The opinions thus obtained are not obligatory farther than as they appear founded in wisdom; we can alter, add, or reject; a complete control is in our power. It is thus we shall unite the efficiency and regularity which are the only good parts of bad government, with the control and the right of rejection, which belong to the most free. Gentlemen, after all, will not be precluded from furnishing the House with the result of their individual labors and talents. Some gentlemen had agreed that if a Committee were to submit a plan to the House, that Committee might obtain all the intelligence necessary from the Secretary. This would, he thought, be better than obtaining information secretly by individuals, but would be very objectionable, and attended with this inconvenience: that the opinions of the Secretary on which the Committee might make their report, would be but partially known to the House, and would come into it unaccompanied by the high responsibility which an official Report from the officer, made in the face of the world, would give them. He would vote for the reference, because he wished, on so tender a subject as that of taxation, to have all possible information, because he felt his right to reject opinions to which he might not be able to subscribe, and because he thought the House too delicate to obtain official information in any other mode than that in which they might rightfully exert their impartial judgments in its admission or rejection.

Mr. FIDLEY.—I object to the resolution for calling upon the Secretary to report upon the ways and means, as contrary to the principles of the Government, and inconsistent with the purity and independence of the House of Representatives, whose duty it is exclusively to prepare or originate revenue laws.

I consider this mode as a transfer of Legislative authority. It is a serious question, if Legislative authority can be transferred by the constitutional Representatives of the people. If it can, how far? If any part of the constitutional Legislative trust can be transferred, may not all or any part thereof be so? The opinion I have received, and in which I am firmly persuaded, is, that the Legislature, nor any branch thereof, can do any part of legislation by proxy. The members only are responsible for the discharge of that trust; they are the official judges of the principles and objects of legislation.

The House of Representatives are peculiarly intrusted with the authority of digesting fiscal arrangements and principles; of saying what shall be a subject of taxation, to what amount, and the uses to which it shall be applied. This power is supposed by the Constitution of the United States, and by the constitutions of most or all of the separate States, to be a most important and influential part of Legislative authority. Hence the Senates, though they are also the people's Representatives, are in other respects vested with equal Legislative authority, are not permitted to prepare revenue systems; their attempting to do it would be an unconstitutional usurpation of Legislative power.

The method of transferring a power to the Secretary to digest the principles of money bills, and report them officially to the House, accompanied with his arguments in support of the principles and arrangements contained in his Report; which has been sanctioned by Congress, and is now about to be repeated by the resolution before you, I consider as a method of originating money bills highly improper in itself, and which has a dangerous tendency.

But a worthy member [I believe Mr. AMES] informs us, in defence of the resolution, that the Secretary can prepare a revenue system with more consistency with respect to the existing revenue laws, and better calculated to support public credit; that it will pass with greater facility through the House; that the members do not possess sufficient information to enable them to originate the business; that the Secretary only is possessed of the information competent to it; that we can judge of his systems when they are laid before us, as there will always be some to find out his defects, and expose them. All these arguments respecting the incompetency of the members for the business, and the superior fitness of the Secretary, apply against the Government itself. If the Constitution vests this House with a trust which it is not qualified to discharge, it is time to change it, and adopt a more simple form. It is much better to have a Minister responsible to the people for the revenue systems they introduce, than to have the responsibility lost in the Legislature. If the members of this House are only to give a sanction to the Minister's systems, it is better to dispense with that sanction. I have no doubt but that the Secretary of the Treasury is very capable of discharging this duty; and, if he was a member of this House, I would not say he was unfit for his part of that trust; but this is not the place for paucity. The Minister's eminent abilities, or his want of them, is all one to me on this subject. The modesty of gentlemen who declare themselves unfit, is not very honorable to the House, nor easy to be credited. Let the House fix its own principles, judge for themselves of the proper sources of revenue, and of the uses to which it ought to be applied; and capacity and information will grow out of the investigation. If the members differ in opinion, as may be expected, they will propose different systems; and, by comparison and discussion, they will become the better acquainted with the subject. If the members stand in need of that information which arises from the operation of existing laws, or of the efficiency of operating revenues, the President has a constitutional power to call upon the Heads of Departments for that information, and communicate it to the Legislature; and the House, by its own authority, has a right to call for information from any Officer or Department, upon any subject respecting which it may originate laws. This is a power incidental to legislation. But with respect to the general interests of the community, the knowledge of which must grow out of a representation of all the local interests, this can only be found among the members of this House; and, if the representation was more numerous and more equal, that kind of information would be still more perfect. Certainly this House contains in itself more extensive knowledge of the people's wants and pressures, of their situation and prepossessions, and of their resources, than the most enlightened Minister can possibly do—especially when it is considered that all the documents locked up in the Minister's office are at their command. The practice of the House, in depending on the Minister to originate principles, and to furnish the House with volumes of arguments in favor of those principles, and the custom of members having recourse to those arguments as authorities, has done more to dishonor Congress, and lessen the members in the public esteem, since the change of the Government, than any other part of their conduct. How can Congress be respectable, if they spend long sessions, at a great expense, on the most influential parts of legislation, only to give a sanction to Ministerial systems; or, at best, only to criticize and correct them?

If, as it is alleged, the Secretary of the Treasury, framing revenue systems, is better calculated to support public credit, and gives the business a greater facility in its passage through the House—

I say if this is true, it proves the influence to be dangerous in a high degree. Certainly, public credit, and the means of supporting it, ought to depend only on the will of the Legislature, and neither on the wisdom nor the caprice of a Minister; indeed, if it stands upon any other authority or influence, it is not fixed upon stable ground; for the Legislature may, and will, some time or other, act upon its own principles, and in this case the change of systems may be the more sensible. Gentlemen are wrong in arguing from the old Government to the new; the old Government was not vested with powers, nor possessed of resources for the support of public credit; therefore the not supporting it cannot be ascribed to the Minister's not originating the systems. The gentlemen say, that it is proper the Secretary should be permitted to accompany his Report with arguments, in order to explain the principles thereof, and state the facts with which it is connected. I wholly object to a Minister's dictating or propounding revenue systems, and still more to his supporting them with arguments, as it is carrying the influence of the Executive administration to a still greater extent. The President has a constitutional right to communicate information, to recommend such subjects as he may think expedient, and to exercise a limited negative after the bills have passed both Houses. But if the President was to claim a right to originate a money-bill, it would be judged contrary to the principles of the Government, and dangerous to liberty. How much more dangerous, and I had almost said degrading, is it to transfer that power to a temporary Minister, not chosen by the people nor responsible to them.

But, one gentleman says, that this is made the Secretary's duty by the law which constitutes his office. That it is made his duty by law is a sufficient apology for him in undertaking and discharging it, but not for the House in transferring it to him. I deny that the House can be bound by a law with respect to its powers and duties. This House is as free to originate money-bills as the last House was, and any future House will be as free as this. The Constitution is the only law whereby the powers and duties of this House can be governed, nor can we either decline a duty or transfer a trust which has been specially bound on us by it. Nor will I agree with the gentlemen that if it is an evil it arises from necessity. Certainly if we are capable of altering, amending, or changing the principles of the Secretary's Reports altogether, as is granted, we must be capable, with due industry and attention, to originate them ourselves.

But we are further told, in defence of referring to the Secretary, that if we do not do it ourselves, the committee employed, or some of the members, will have recourse to the Secretary for assistance, and that in this way his principles and arguments will be introduced with equal influence secretly, and that it is better to face it openly, and for all the members to have equal advantages from it. This argument is plausible indeed, but will not bear examination. So far is the method contended for from preventing private influence, that it produces it in a much greater degree. From the nature of the case we may conclude, that a Minister will not digest a revenue system without adapting it to the views and interests of a number of influential members, who will assist him in preparing and influencing others to support it when introduced; indeed, it gives the greatest possible stimulus to private influence; for it not only combines an influential private interest to support it, but the Minister's character and the character of his friends are much higher pledged for its success than if the influence was private. Thus, I apprehend, this method is not only objectionable on account of the Ministerial systems and arguments which the members receive in this House, and peruse in their closets, but also on account of the greater inducement it must give to corruption. But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] observes, that we may upon the same grounds object to the President's Address, recommending business to the Legislature; that myself and others who oppose the reference in question, very lately advocated a Report of the Secretary of War, which he opposed; that by carrying the substance of that Report into a law, we have saddled the Government with a debt for which we are now about to provide; and he suggests the impropriety of those for whose immediate defence the debt is incurred objecting to the usual method of providing for its discharge.

I have observed already, that the President has a right, created by the Constitution, to recommend business to the Legislature, as well as to give information of the state of the Union; in consequence of this trust he, by a Report of his Secretary, gave us information of the state and misfortunes of the Indian war, and his opinion of the force and expense that he judged necessary to enable him to bring it to a happy and speedy conclusion. This information was constitutional and necessary. Well knowing that an inadequate force and the short enlistments rendered the two last campaigns disgraceful, and increased the strength and irritation of the enemy, I voted for the increase of the army, and for longer enlistments; but I voted for higher wages than was reported, and we will yet regret that this was not agreed to; and I think, in doing so, I was promoting the best interests of the country, and countenancing no unconstitutional influence. Surely if the gentleman would reflect for a moment, he would not quote this as a precedent to justify this House in voting a transfer of the peculiar and exclusive constitutional privilege and inalienable trust of this House, to originate or digest the principles of revenue systems, to an Executive Officer, not known in the Constitution, nor appointed by or dependent on this House.

I will further beg leave to inform the gentleman, that the people of the frontiers do not claim protection as a favor; they demand it as a right; they know that protection and allegiance are inseparable; that if they are not protected, their connexion with the Government is dissolved; it is in their lot and their misfortune to be exposed as constant picket guard to the interior inhabitants; too frequently have their habitations been rendered desolate, and they have had their dearest relatives butchered. When the Atlantic shores were the object of invasion, neither the inclemency of the season nor the dangerous situations of their families at home prevented them from giving assistance. They have had little weight in the Councils which have, by affording inadequate means of protection, increased their distress; they think it ungenerous to be aided with a too sparing hand, and at the same time insulted with unmerited reproach.

The gentleman says, he has heard me often moving to refer petitions to one or other of the Secretaries myself. I acknowledge it. When the petitions are for personal claims, being of a judicial nature, and connected with the documents in the Secretary's office, I think it proper to refer them there for information with respect to facts. When I moved for a reference of the excise petitions which came in by me, I did it in obedience to the custom of the House, but with an express declaration that I thought the custom then wrong; that, I have no doubt, the members will recollect. The gentleman has also observed, that there is independence and good sense enough in this House to examine, to alter, or reject a Report of the Secretary, notwithstanding his arguments which accompany it, and that we have done so in various instances. This I freely grant; nay, I advocate more than this: I believe there is good sense and independence enough in this House to digest and originate revenue systems without the Secretary's doing it for us. But what does this argument amount to? Why, it amounts to giving the peculiar trust of originating to the Secretary, and reserving that power to ourselves which the Constitution vests in the other branch. The Senate cannot prepare a money bill, but they may alter, amend, or reject such as we prepare and transmit to them; and they have done so. Is not this giving the power and influence in a great degree to the Secretary, which the Constitution gives to us? Is it not, in fact, giving up the point? The Senate is not permitted to digest their arguments and transmit them to us in support of business which they prepare; neither are we permitted to do so with them. Nay, it is unconstitutional to mention what we think would be agreeable to the Senate or the President, in our arguments on the floor, lest it should have the appearance of influencing the measure. The one branch cannot call upon the other officially to originate business; how unreasonable, then, is it to refer the most important business to the Secretary to digest and prepare, and also to digest arguments for us which we order to be printed and put into every member's hand. But this method is highly objectionable on another ground. It is putting the power of the business out of our hands with respect to the time of our deliberation; this is certainly more than we are authorized to do, or can be accountable for to our constituents. If this practice becomes established, I shall not be surprised to find a Minister, in connexion with his friends in the House, delaying to report on the most important subjects until near the end of the session, when many of the members are gone home, or so anxious to get home that there will not be a sufficient opportunity for deliberation. Such things are not unusually attempted in public bodies without the aid of a Minister; in this House, I have heard the close of a session mentioned as an apology for the passage of an improper law; it is not necessary to create new snares for the deliberations of the House. Before I had the honor of a seat in this House, I was informed of this method of originating revenue systems, and I always thought it wrong. I am not confident the opposition to it will succeed at this time; the session is drawing near a close, and the opposition of members who advocate the proposed reference may delay the business, if originated in a way disagreeable to them. These reasons may induce some members to vote for it now, that would not do so in other circumstances; however, if it is carried, I hope the precedent will not be strengthened by a large majority. For my part, I pledge myself to persevere in opposition thereto; and have no doubt but when a more equal and more numerous representation occupies this floor, this unwarrantable practice of transferring so influential a part of the Legislative trust will be changed.

The question being put, that the House do agree to the resolution, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 27—as follows:

FRIDAY, March 9.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating the copy of a statement of the expenditures of public moneys pursuant to the act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; this statement was read, and laid on the table.

STATE DUTIES OF TONNAGE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill declaring the assent of Congress to State Duties of Tonnage—Indemnity to General Greene.

certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, which impose a small duty on tonnage for the purpose of clearing obstructions in the navigation of the Sound—Mr. W. SWANN in the Chair.

Mr. GILES moved to strike out the first clause, and made sundry remarks on the unequal operation of a law of Maryland which should subject the vessels of other States to a tax solely for the benefit of the port of Baltimore. It is designed by this bill to raise a fund to be applied for the removal of a natural obstruction in the navigation of that port, and hence he considered it as a petual tax on the citizens of other States; in this view, he objected to it as a partial imposition; it was much complained of by the neighboring ports; he hoped therefore the clause would be struck out.

Mr. SENEY supported the clause. He observed, that though the port of Baltimore would be benefited in the first instance, yet it was by no means a partial business; the accommodation and safety to shipping resulting from it had an important reference to the commerce of the Union; it contributed to the security of navigation, both foreign and domestic—and the importance of the trade of that place was sufficiently obvious from the amount of the revenue collected there. The salutary effects of the regulations which have been adopted and sanctioned by Congress, he conceived were sufficient reason for continuing those regulations.

Mr. GOONHUS and Mr. GENAY offered a few remarks in opposition to the regulation, and said the provision might be extended with equal propriety to various other parts of the Union; it ought not therefore to be taken up except on general principles.

Mr. MURRAY defended the regulation of the bill on general principles. He considered it in the light of a turnpike road, which, though it may subject the citizens to a tax, they are abundantly compensated by the benefits resulting from the accommodation thereby provided; the tonnage paid is a small duty, applied expressly to this object, and cannot reasonably be considered as an oppressive or partial tax; and it is paid by those who are immediately benefited, and is in every sense reciprocal.

Mr. NILES said he had seconded the motion for striking out on a mistaken apprehension. He had supposed the money to be collected was to go into the public Treasury, but the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] had undeceived him, and he thought his comparison to a turnpike road was in point; he then enlarged on this idea, and said he could not conceive what injury would result from extending the principle to any part of the Union where similar obstructions exist.

Mr. STERNETT supported the clause. He gave a short history of the subject, and then enlarged on the general policy of the measure. It had been objected to by one gentleman on constitutional ground; this was an objection which he had not expected, but he conceived it totally unfounded, as no partial preference was contended for, but merely the continuance of a regulation which had been sanctioned by the General Government, and was clearly within the spirit and letter of the clause which has reference to the commerce and navigation of the States; it is a regulation of a general nature, that tends to the advancement of the trade of the Union as well as of that particular port.

Mr. AMES and Mr. WARRIS both spoke in favor of the clause—the latter observed that it appeared to him perfectly constitutional.

Mr. GILES denied that the benefits resulting from the regulation were reciprocal; they are confined to the town of Baltimore; and, if the clause is agreed to, he said he should move for a bill to confer similar benefits on all other seaports laboring under natural impediments in their harbors.

Mr. HARTLEY supported the clause on general principles, and said he should advocate a law which has for its object similar regulations in respect to any other place laboring under the like difficulties.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, as an owner of shipping, he should give his consent to any law which provides for removing the obstructions in navigation. No impositions are paid with more cheerfulness than those which are designed to procure safety and accommodation to the shipping. He enlarged on the advantages which result to the general interest, both of the merchant and farmer, from the shipping being able to penetrate far into the country by the navigable rivers; similar applications, said he, may be made from other quarters, and if they should be would give his assent to them.

Mr. FITZSIMONS added some observations in favor of the clause, and then the question being put, the motion for striking out was negatived.

The Committee proceeded through the other sections, and then reported the bill without amendment.

The blank for the continuance of the act was filled with three years, and then it was ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading.

INDEMNITY TO GENERAL GREENE.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the 24th of February last, to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, for a certain suretyship entered into by the said Nathaniel, in his life-time, on public account.

The report being read, a memorial of Henry Hill was presented by Mr. FITZSIMONS, praying that no law may be passed in the case which may operate to the injury of the petitioner in respect to an assignment made to him of a certain demand against the United States, by one of the partners of Banks and Company. Mr. F. recapitulated the general objections which had been before urged against the indemnification, and concluded by a motion in which it was proposed that the business should be put into a train of legal investigation.

Mr. BALDWIN, after some remarks highly favorable to General Greene's character, observed, that a legal process in this case did not appear to offer those accommodations which this case seemed to call for. He then entered into a general consideration of the subject, in the course of which he observed, that certain bold and striking traits distinguished the conduct of General Greene during the late war. He acted as a Soldier, a Politician, a Legislator, a Commissary, a Quarter-master, and a General; in short, like a man who was conducting a Revolution on the success of which his own life depended and the liberties of his country, perhaps of mankind. He then adverted to the evidence which had been adduced to show that no partnership existed between General Greene and Banks, and that the engagements he entered into were on a public account. He said the characters of those who had solemnly testified on that occasion were such as to banish every trace of suspicion from his mind. He concluded by observing, that if ever a claim on the justice and humanity of a country existed, the present was such a claim.

Mr. STEELE said, he hoped the report would not be agreed to. He said the subject appeared now to be involved in more complexity than it at first appeared to be attended with. In all appropriations of money, the subject ought to be well considered; but what have the gentlemen who reported the resolutions done? Instead of producing that evidence which would pass in any Court of Justice, they have adduced General Greene's character, virtues, services, &c.; of these he had as just an opinion as any one, but he thought they were not altogether pertinent to the occasion. He hoped a further investigation would be made, and that if the Report was not rejected, the business would be put in a different train. Various and contradictory statements have taken place in the course of the discussion in six weeks. Some things are now admitted which were before denied. As the advocates of the Report have founded their arguments on the character of General Greene, he thought it his duty to bring forward some circumstances, which, though they do not impeach his character as a soldier and a brave man, yet they show his want of sincerity and consistency. He then adverted to the letters which he wrote, abusing the people South of the Potomac, at the very time he was experiencing their munificence and liberality. These things he mentioned not to injure his reputation, but to show that full credit ought not to be given to his subsequent assertions and declarations. He observed that the subject had not been so fully investigated, nor had such evidence been adduced as would justify an appropriation of the sum of sixty thousand dollars. He then took notice of those documents which appeared to favor the idea that General Greene was connected with Banks and Co. This matter, he thought, had not been placed in the most satisfactory point of light; a more thorough investigation ought to take place, and in order to do this, he said the subject had better be postponed to the next session.

Mr. CLARK was opposed to agreeing to the Report; he offered several objections arising from the obscurity which envelope the transactions.

Mr. HILLHOUSE stated sundry reasons why he should vote against the Report; and then the House adjourned without deciding the question.

SATURDAY, March 10.

An engrossed bill declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland; and to continue for a longer time an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, was read the third time and passed.

A petition of Isaac Ledyard was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for services in the Military Hospital of the United States; referred to the Secretary of War, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

COURTESIES TO FRANCE.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House hath received, with sentiments of high satisfaction, the notification of the King of the French, of his acceptance of the Constitution presented to him in the name of the Nation; and that the President of the United States be requested, in his answer to the said notification, to express the sincere participation of the House in the interests of the French Nation, on this great and important event; and their wish that the wisdom and magnanimity displayed in the formation and acceptance of the Constitution, may be rewarded by the most perfect attainment of its object, the permanent happiness of so great a people.

It was moved and seconded that the said motion be committed. And on the question for commitment, it passed in the negative—yeas 17, nays 35—as follows:

And then debate arising on the said motion, a division thereof was called for. Whereupon, The question being put, that the House do agree to the first part of the said motion, in the words following:

Resolved, That this House has received, with sentiments of high satisfaction, the notification of the King of the French, of his acceptance of the Constitution presented to him in the name of the Nation: And that the President of the United States be requested, in his answer to the said notification, to express the sincere participation of the House in the interests of the French Nation, on this great and important event."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 50, nays 2, as follows:

NAYS.—Robert Barnwell and Egbert Benson.

On the question, that the House do agree to the second part of the said motion, in the words following:

"And their wish that the wisdom and magnanimity displayed in the formation and acceptance of the Constitution, may be rewarded by the most perfect attainment of its object, the permanent happiness of so great a People."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, William B. Giles, Nicholas Gilman, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John W. NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, James Hillhouse, Israel Jacobs, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and Artemas Ward.

Ordered, That Mr. TUCKER, Mr. MADISON, Mr. MERCER, Mr. VINING, and Mr. PAGE, be appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States, with the said resolution.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That, in the case of the contested election on the petition of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia, the sitting member have leave to be heard by his Counsel at the bar of this House, on Monday next."

It was resolved in the affirmative.

MONDAY, March 12.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

This being the day to which the trial of the contested election in the case of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia, stood postponed; the House proceeded to take up the same for consideration. Whereupon,

The sitting member, with his Counsel, and the petitioner, being present at the bar of the House, application was made by the Counsel for the sitting member further to postpone the hearing on the said trial until Wednesday se'night. On which application, the parties respectively being fully heard, and the question put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

The petitioner then proceeded to exhibit and read his proofs in support of the allegations of his petition, so far as respects the first article of charge therein contained; when an adjournment being called for,

Ordered, That all farther proceeding on the said hearing be postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 13.

Mr. TUCKER, from the committee appointed on Saturday last to wait on the President of the United States, with the resolution, of the same day, expressive of the sense of this House of the notification by the King of the French of his acceptance of the Constitution, presented to him in the name of the nation, reported that the committee had discharged the duty assigned to them.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for an apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives, after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the hearing on the trial of the contested election, in the case of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia.

Mr. LEWIS (Counsel for Mr. WAYNE) appealed from the charges contained in the petition, in support of the sitting member, and stated reasons why it would be proper in the House to grant a further postponement, which he moved for. The chief arguments were, that there was certain evidence expected by Mr. WAYNE which had not arrived from Savannah.

A debate of two hours took place upon the motion for postponement, which was negative, 19 members only rising in the affirmative; consequently the trial commenced.

It was opened by a short exordium from Mr. Jackson, who was allowed to read and comment upon his evidence until past the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. Jackson observed that, whilst he acknowledged the unpleasant task of appearing as a prosecutor, and sincerely wished the occasion had never presented itself; and whilst he lamented that so much of the public time which was required to other important objects had been expended, he could not help expressing the satisfaction he felt at the prospect of a decision on the Georgia election; nor could he forbear to observe that the doors of investigation could never be too widely extended on a subject of such capital import, and where the liberties of the people were so materially interested.

One of the greatest advantages, he observed, of a free Government was the right, which every individual of the community possessed, of making the grievances he lay under known; but that what in a private man, where there had been a private injury, was a private right, became, in a public man, where a public grievance or injury to the community had taken place, a public and indispensable duty.

Possessing, therefore, the testimony he did, and being in the situation he was, a candidate at that election, and the person who he believed, had justice been done, ought to have held the seat on that floor, he felt himself called on, in a double capacity, first, as a private individual, to assert his own rights, and, secondly, as a public man, to prevent an injury to the community—silence would have been inexcusable, and he should justly have been charged by his fellow-citizens as the betrayer of the rights of those whom he might most improperly term his constituents. He observed, that it was but a short time since that a period had been put to a Revolution, which, although glorious in its issue, was severe and bloody in its contests.

It was needless for him to remind the honorable House of the groundwork, the cause of that Revolution, where so many of its members had participated in its dangers, and had been distinguished in its conflicts; that it must be well remembered that the avowed principle, the declared right of Britain to bind America in all cases whatsoever, without representation, was the cause. Sir, added he, the right of representation was what America fought for seven long years, for which so many States were desolated, and for which so many heroes fell. Yet, strange as it might appear, scarce half a score of years had passed away ere this right had been violated and trampled on; trampled on ere the blood of our fellow-citizens, spilt in its defence, was as yet scarcely cold, and whilst the vestiges of the Revolutionary War were still exposed to every eye.

To prove this—and, for the honor of human nature, he wished he could not—was the object of his petition, and his appearance at the bar of the House; that, in the prosecution, he wished the House to observe that it was not their favor, but their justice, which he demanded; that the names or merits of the sitting member, of himself, should not be known on the occasion; and that, for his own part, whatever might be the opinion of the honorable gentleman, of his merits or ability, he had not the vanity to suppose that his being in or out of Congress would affect the interest of America in the smallest degree; but that the question, abstractedly considered, was a question of the greatest magnitude, in which the lives, the liberties, the fortunes, the happiness of the American people, were materially involved; for it could not be denied that they all depended, in a greater or lesser degree, on the representation in that House; that the question was rendered more important by its being the first of its kind, and therefore would become the rule of decision in all future cases.

He then proceeded to state the facts and charges in his petition, and to make a few observations on them; that those observations should be as concise as possible, for he wished to address the House, not as a common jury, liable to be biased by prejudice, or to be imposed on by quibbles, but as the great guardians of the nation, sitting in a judicial capacity on a great and an important question, and in the decision of which the whole community was concerned.

After stating that he had testimony of another nature, which he had been prevented by the resolution from bringing forward, being tied down to the express articles of charge, which, in the Effingham election, were confined in two points—that of there being more votes than voters, and but one qualified magistrate presiding thereat, he proceeded to the investigation of those charges, and produced the following evidence:

First, the law of the State of Georgia for the election, by which he proved that the State was divided into three districts; that three magistrates were required to open a poll; that the poll was to be opened at nine o'clock on the 3d of January, 1791, and to be continued open until sunset; that the voters within the districts were to meet on the day of election in their respective counties, agreeably to the Constitution, to elect, by ballot, one person for each district, agreeably to proclamation. He then produced the return of the election itself, which proved the charge of there being nine more votes than voters; and, by the signatures of the three persons presiding, it appeared that but one of them had signed as a magistrate. He observed here that he should deem this sufficient if he brought no more evidence, but that he would now produce the testimony of Bell and Hudson, two of the persons acting at that election, to prove that they acted as private individuals, and in no other manner whatever. Mr. Bell's testimony went to prove that, when he arrived at the place of election, he was accosted by Lane, the sheriff of the county, who then first apprised him of his appointment, and persuaded him to sit as a magistrate; that he refused at first, saying he had no right, but afterwards agreed to sit, saying he might as well sit there as any where else; that he refused to sign the return as a magistrate, and that he signed as an individual, and in no other manner; that he was not at that time qualified; and, in the cross-examination by Mr. Gibbons, he, on being asked if he had ever acted as a magistrate before that election, answered that he had never acted as a magistrate until that time.

He next produced the testimony of Mr. Hudson, who proved much the same as Mr. Bell; and added, that he found the people intoxicated between ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon; that Messrs. Gibbons, Moore, and Putnam, residents of Chatham, voted in Effingham; that he gave up his opinion to Mr. Gibbons that the magistrates were not qualified; that a qualification was necessary, he produced the testimony of John Godlieb Meidlinger, clerk of the Superior Court of Effingham county, who proved that he never saw them act as magistrates before; that he did not consider them as magistrates; and that they were qualified in open court after the day of election.

Meidlinger, whose testimony was taken on behalf of the sitting member, likewise proved that the grand jury of the county had presented the election as illegal; indeed, added Mr. Jackson, a qualification on oath is necessary, and is founded on the justest reasoning. Should not he be qualified on oath, who has the power to qualify on oath? Should not he be bound by some tie, who has the personal liberty and property of his fellow-citizens so greatly at his disposal? "Miserable is that servitude where the law is vague and uncertain," says a law author; but much more miserable, he thought, would be that country where the public and private rights of a community would be at the will of a little despot of a Justice, without any tie, human or Divine. He did not mention this to censure the persons who had signed the return; he knew them to be honest and well intentioned, and they had objected to sitting as magistrates themselves.

It was in Georgia as it was in most other new countries; to prevent greater evils the Government was compelled to appoint characters of this kind; honest and upright persons, who were totally unacquainted with the law; men who generally did well when left to themselves, but who, when worked on by artful and designing persons, such as Lane, the sheriff, who you find by Bell's testimony persuaded him to sit, and that he had a right to do so, although it was the first time he had heard of his appointment. Lyman, the attorney, whom you find informing Hudson, to induce him to sit, that he had spoken to the Governor, who had answered, "It did not make the least odds whether he was qualified or not;" and this person, Gibbons, whose soul is faction, and whose life has been a scene of political corruption; who never could be easy under Government—

[Here Mr. Jackson was called to order.] After apologizing to the House, he observed that he was commenting on facts; that the proofs were strong against Gibbons of abominable corruption; that this corruption was, in a great measure, of his charges; that Gibbons had gone out of his own county, not merely to use an undue influence with the electors, but to corrupt even the magistrates themselves; that it was evident, that when he worked on those persons they had given up their own opinions; and here he appealed to the evidence of Hudson, who swore that he had objected to Gibbons, Putnam, and Moore, signing the return, but had been prevailed on by Gibbons, and had given up his own opinion to him, as Gibbons was an attorney at law, and he, Hudson, supposing him to know more of these matters than himself.

Mr. Jackson likewise here appealed to the House whether, if a law had been passed by Congress on elections, Mr. Gibbons's behaviour would not have come under it, and whether an offender of the kind would not have been severely punished; that there would be no safety for the liberties of the people, if such corruptions could be permitted; you find, says he, the electors generally intoxicated by ten or eleven o'clock in the morning; the electors in that situation could not tell who they voted for. Why, he asked, were those individuals so solicitous to get those persons to sit, but that they supposed they would be more docile to their measures, and permit those to vote who had no right to vote?

Hence, he said, your honorable House find Gibbons, Moore, and Putnam, voted in Effingham contrary to the law and Constitution, giving their suffrages. [Here Mr. Jackson produced the testimony of John Moore, which was objected to by Mr. Lewis, but on argument it was admitted; who proved that one John King, a minor, had voted. Mr. Moore likewise proved that Gibbons, Lyman, and James Moore, were very active in favor of Mr. Wayne, and that there were nine more votes than voters; and that Hudson had signed the return at the instigation of Gibbons.] Hence, too, he said, the House might perceive other irregularities, such as magistrates and clerks leaving the poll altogether, and hence, no doubt, the nine more votes than voters. [Here he produced the testimony of Thomas Wyllis, who corroborated the testimony before read very fully, and proved that the poll was sometimes left by the justices and clerks; he further declared that he knew Bell and Hudson not to be qualified magistrates.]

And hence, he observed, the very return itself was drawn up by this Mr. Gibbons; what right had he to interfere with this return? But, notwithstanding all this cunning and corruption of Gibbons, the very return was deficient. Were it not in the same bundle and under the same seal, there would be no knowing whether it was an election for a member of Congress or a member for the State Legislature; whether an election for the office of a coroner, or that of a constable. [He here produced the return, which did not mention that the election was held for, but barely declares that at an election held at Elberton, in the said county, the candidates were, &c.]

Mr. Jackson also observed that there was some testimony brought forward by the sitting member, to prove that a Mr. Lavier was a magistrate and a worthy man. Why, he would ask, did he go away? Why did he not sign the return, but that there were some such transactions going forward which he could not bring his mind to consent to? Mr. JACKSON made a variety of other observations, which continued until an adjournment was called for. Next day—

Mr. JACKSON proceeded in his observations, and remarked to the House, that some members had been solicitous to see a law of Georgia where a qualification was rendered necessary, previous to a magistrate's entering on the duties of his office; that he had been uncertain yesterday whether he had the law present with him or not; that he now felt himself happy in being able to satisfy those members on that point.

[He here produced the law, and which appeared positively to require the magistrates taking and subscribing the oath therein prescribed, previous to their entering on any official duty.]

Mr. JACKSON then observed that he would, as he was on the Effingham business, beg leave to produce the Constitution of Georgia, to ground what he had advanced yesterday respecting the right of Mr. Gibbons, Mr. Putnam, and Mr. Moore's voting at Effingham. From the 1st section, 4th article of the Constitution of Georgia, it required six months' residence in the county; this he read in his place, and said he considered the grounds of his charges respecting the Effingham return and election so well established, that he would take up no more time of the House on that business.

He observed to the House that the next charge was that of the suppression of the Glynn return; but as the House had been pleased to indulge him in the mode of conducting the prosecution, he would beg the permission to pass over the second, and come to the third charge, that for the county of Camden.

And here he came, he said, to a scene of iniquity indeed, a scene which had improved upon British corruption, and had left ancient and modern story all behind; we read, it is true, of a Roman consul who stole the votes from the forum, to prevent an election of the people, and we have heard of British sheriffs falsifying returns in favor of their friends; but here was a Judge of the land, the great check upon the Executive Department, (and agreeably to the principles of free Government, they ought to be separate and distinct,) acting as the Executive officer, the sacred guardian of the laws, the liberties, and privileges of his fellow-citizens, violating them all, and trampling them beneath his feet; who not only set down more votes than the county had, but added to the polls names which were never known. Here the sacred office of a judge became subservient to the views of party, and the possessor of it the tool of faction; but he forbore, he said, to animadvert on his notorious conduct; he had been tried, impartially tried; he had been convicted, and been punished; and by that punishment the character of his country had been restored. Yes, said he, Georgia, thou hast set an example worthy of thy elder sisters! thou hast hung out a warning to tyranny and its supporters; thou hast set an example which must be respected, and I trust will be followed, in similar circumstances, in the United States, to the end of time.

He would proceed to offer the evidence on the charges, and he begged leave to assure the House that he would conform as much as possible, in the mode of producing the evidence, to the wishes of some gentlemen yesterday; and the first testimony he would read would be that of Daniel Miller, who was one of the clerks of the check of the poll of Camden, and a necessary officer under the law of Georgia, which he produced, and whereby it appeared that the superintending officers at elections are empowered to appoint three clerks to attend, and to keep three rolls or checks, setting down the names of the voters therein, with the names of the candidates, &c. He observed that it would appear by Miller's testimony that he was one of these clerks; that the check was preserved, and sent on annexed to the testimony; that the whole number of votes at the legal poll was but twenty-five, fifteen for General WAYNE, and ten for himself; that poll was closed agreeably to law, on or about sunset; that he had scarcely daylight to complete the return by which it was made out by him, and signed by the presiding magistrates outside the door; that a person by the name of Allen Thomas was spoken to, to carry the said express to the Governor; that the return was then lodged in his hands for safe keeping until the next day. This testimony Mr. JACKSON read, which further proved that Mr. Osborne had taken the return from Miller, with a promise of returning it in the morning, Miller having been sent for by Osborne in the night; that Mr. Wright, one of the magistrates at the first poll, advised with Mr. Miller, with a proposal of Osborne's of adding the legal and the night election together, and to which Wright, at that time, seemed adverse, but afterwards consented, telling Miller that Osborne had not returned the first or legal return, having made out another more to his mind, having found fault with some of the words of the former, adding that Mr. Osborne was a very good patcher, and that, if it was a measure insupportable, he would not have done it, and that he had given up, as Miller believed, his opinion to the better one of Judge Osborne; Miller's testimony likewise proved that the legal return was suppressed or destroyed. To corroborate the testimony of Miller, Mr. JACKSON observed, that he would produce the testimony of Samuel Smith, the sheriff of Camdentown, whose presence at the election was made necessary by law. Mr. Smith proved that he attended the election, performing the duty required of him. Mr. Smith proved that the poll was continued till after sunset; that after the poll was closed, he saw the return made out by one of the clerks appointed to keep the checks; that he saw it signed by the presiding magistrates, viz: Henry Wright, Langley Bryan, and Hugh Brown.

That an express was engaged to carry the return to the Governor, and that the number of votes at the said election did not exceed thirty; that the business of the day being concluded, and it being then dark, he returned to his lodgings, two miles distant from the place of election; that some time after he got there, he received a message from Osborne, requesting his return with the people there with him: that he observed to those about him that he supposed the business of that day at end, and that he should not return until next morning.

That, when he returned in the morning, he was told that a second poll had been held the evening before, a certified return of which he had seen, containing eighty-nine votes, and that he did not believe that, at that time, there were above seventy persons entitled to vote in the county. That he was well acquainted with Miller, who acted as one of the clerks of the check, and that he was a man of veracity, and well respected.

Mr. JACKSON next produced the testimony of Dr. John M. Scott, one of the surgeons of the first regiment of the United States; a gentleman, he said, who had been as delicate in coming forward as his opposers could wish. It had been with difficulty he had procured his evidence, but Dr. Scott, when he did come forward, had given his testimony to prove that a second or illegal poll had been held. The doctor's evidence set forth that he was in Camden, at the station on St. Mary's, in the month of January, 1791; that he went to the election with some gentlemen in a boat; that on the passage they fell in with Osborne.

That they arrived at Gray's about dark, and that Osborne examined Gray respecting the election, and begged him to come on board and pilot him to the place of election; that Gray showed them the landing, and that a torch was brought them to show them where to land; that, on going up to the house where the election was held, the judge inquired what time the people went away; that it was answered the poll was closed at sunset; that Osborne sent for several of the electors to return, and that the poll was again opened; that the whole number did not exceed twenty; that Mr. Seagrove's name was put down as a voter, but who was not present; that Osborne inquired of Gray the names of those who were not present at the first election, and that their names were likewise set down as voters; that he did not see a ticket or ballot given in; that he asked the judge if this was the common mode of doing business at elections in Georgia, to which Osborne replied to him, Never to mind.

Mr. JACKSON now produced the affidavit of Gray, to which some objections were made by Mr. Lewis, on behalf of the sitting member, and on which an argument, and reading the statement of the magistrate, was admitted. Gray corroborated the evidence of Dr. Scott in a full manner, and proved the absentees' names being set down to the poll, particularly Seagrove's and Goodbread's.

Mr. JACKSON next brought forward the testimony of Abner Williams, to which objections were likewise made by Mr. Lewis, that it did not appear to be written in the magistrate's presence; many nice and refined distinctions and reasonings were given, and the testimony was ultimately rejected. Mr. JACKSON observed that he had other testimony of the same nature from Camden, which, as the House had decided against the testimony of Williams, he should not produce.

From the testimony Mr. JACKSON had produced, he thought he had fully established the iniquity and illegality of the Camden election, and he begged them to observe the chain of evidence; you find, says he, Miller, a public officer, doing his duty at the election, who swears that the legal poll consisted but of twenty-five votes, that fifteen were for Mr. WAYNE, and ten for himself; you find the poll was closed at sundown, agreeably to law; you find that Miller had scarcely daylight to complete the return by; you find that presiding magistrates, on that account, signed the return outside the door; you find the return delivered to Miller for safe keeping, and you find an express applied to; you find the number from Smith's testimony, who was the sheriff of the county, and a necessary officer at the poll, corroborating the testimony of Miller, that the number of votes did not exceed thirty; an express was absolutely engaged to carry the return to the Governor, and that after the law had been complied with, the electors had generally dispersed; you next find, by the testimony of Dr. Scott and Gray, the arrival of Mr. Osborne after dark, that a torch was brought to show them the landing; you find him sending again for the people, and here you observe the answer of the sheriff, that the business of that day was at an end, and he should not return; notwithstanding this caution, you view, from their evidence, Osborne proceeding to a second election, and setting down absentees' names, who were not present at the first poll, and among them James Seagrove and Philip Goodbread. You find here the question of Dr. Scott, Is this the mode of conducting business at elections in Georgia? Why that question, said he, but that the honest dictates of a virtuous heart spurned at such abominable villany. Mark the answer of this iniquitous judge, "You never mind." Evasion, dark, designing evasion, which carried guilt in its countenance; he dared not explain; the deed would not bear the light. Shall we rest here a moment, said he, and search whence this right of proxy? Is it found in the laws or the Constitution of the Continent? Is it expressed in the laws or the Constitution of Georgia? Is it to be met with in any of the laws or Constitutions of the respective States? In France it is exploded; in England it is only admitted to the Lords; whose right is hereditary; in no free country on earth, said he, is this right established. Shall the United States then be the first to sanction this pernicious principle? Shall she who has lighted up the flame of liberty in other nations, who has astonished the universe, and loosened the trammels on the rights of men, be the first to nourish this tyrannic vulture in her bosom? View how far it leads, see how far it extends, and there is not a freeman who hears me, but must fire with indignation at the attempt. If admitted to one, shall we stop there? Shall we stop at ten, at twenty, at one hundred, or one hundred thousand? Shall we stop at a township, a county, a district, or a State? Sir, the glory of our Constitution is that our rights are equal; and if one citizen may be permitted to vote by proxy, the whole rights of the community may be in like manner delegated, and the consequence might be, that a Dionysius or a Nero might be palmed upon us by authority. He did not like to be severe; he would repress what he felt, out of respect to the House; but with what view did this wicked judge come to that election? He was not actuated by a love of country, for his attempts, if successful, would have damned its liberty; not acting as a magistrate, because, as a magistrate, he was bound by the law, but here he was barefacedly breaking it; but, void of principle, and, from his character, he believed he never possessed any; regardless of oaths, and worked on by prejudice and party, he came there at all events, and by any means, however base or abominable, to prevent his being elected.

Let it be remembered, sir, if this can obtain in Georgia, it can in other States, and the corruption will be general. But, supposing there is right of proxy admitted, he would produce the census of Georgia, under the official signature of the Secretary of State, taken by the marshal of the district of Georgia, whereby it would appear that the whole number of male inhabitants consisted of but eighty-one persons; here were eight more votes than the whole contained, and sixty-four more than the legal poll; but admit, said he, that there are as many voters as the return mentions. Is it not extraordinary that, whilst other counties have polled but one-half, and some not one-fourth of its citizens, this county should have every elector attending? But let us take the two elections, said he, and add them together, and how will they then stand, as appears by the testimony before the House? Dr. Scott swears there were not more than twenty persons at the second election. Twenty, therefore, at the second election, and twenty-five at the first election, are but forty-five, so that forty-four votes are still wanting, at the utmost extent; but, take Gray's testimony, and this deficiency is much greater. [Mr. GILES here asked the question, whether the eighty-one male persons, returned by the census, were the persons above the age of 16 or 21?] Mr. JACKSON, after thanking the honorable gentleman for the question, as it had escaped him in observation, said that the eighty-one were the free males above 16, so that one-fifth of those, which was the nearest proportion, ought to be deducted for those between 16 and 21, and which would bring it to sixty-five, which number was corroborated by the testimony of Smith, the sheriff, who had sworn that the whole number of voters did not exceed, at that time, the amount of seventy. He observed that the testimony of Smith must be of weight, for he was the sheriff of the county, who knew, or must be supposed to know, all the residents, who summoned all jurors, and served all judicial processes. Mr. JACKSON here begged leave to offer a statement he had made out, not as testimony, but to assist the minds of the House of those particular elections, and in the particular views in which they might be received.

[Here follows a statement of the polls in the different counties. Mr. BARRETT here interrupted Mr. JACKSON, as did also Mr. BENSON, by opposing the reading of any calculation; but Mr. MANISON insisted that the petitioner had a right to state the numbers at the different polls.]

Mr. J. then proceeded, by observing that he should now close his evidence and observations on the Camden election; he thought he had perfectly established his charges on this head, as well as on the Effingham election; he had proved that the legal return had been suppressed, and that the second election had been illegal altogether.

He would now proceed to the last article of charge, the Glynn return, and here he should offer the testimony of Colonel Samuel Hammond, a gentleman of the greatest veracity, who would prove—[Here Mr. JACKSON was called on by Mr. LEWIS to produce the evidence, and was desired not to inform the House of the contents of the testimony.]

Mr. LEWIS objected to Colonel Hammond's evidence, on the grounds he had formerly made to the testimony of Williams, and, on argument, it was finally rejected.

Mr. JACKSON here observed that it was not for him to do otherwise than suppose that the decision of the House was proper, however hard it might bear on him, which, he must be permitted to say, it did; that, however, by the failure of the receipt of this testimony, his charge must fall to the ground, as the evidence of Hammond was the principal ground on which he rested his charge, and that he must, therefore, decline bringing forward the other testimonies relating to this business before the House.

He said he felt himself now bound in duty to produce to the House the decision of the State of Georgia on the impeachment of Judge Osborne, and he did not produce it without an expectation of its being objected to; but he begged leave to offer some reasons why it should be received.

Baron Gilbert, in his excellent treatise on evidence, had quoted Mr. Locke, to prove that the degrees of evidence were various, and that they extended from perfect certainty and demonstration, quite down to improbability and unlikelihood, even to the confines of impossibility. Perfect certainty was defined to be a clear and distinct perception with one's own senses; probabilities, on which, in a greater or lesser degree, all other evidence rested, consisted of obscure views, or what was seen or heard by the report of others. The first kind of evidence was not in the power of the House, because none of the facts alleged were within their views; but they were compelled to, and did, by their resolutions, depend on the second kind of evidence, or what was heard by the report of others in Georgia. The House, in receiving the testimony offered, would receive evidence taken at least on as careful grounds as that taken under the resolutions; the facts were the same; the point at issue was the same, whether corruption had or had not taken place at this election; the person accused was present, with his attorneys, to cross-examine; two of the attorneys of the sitting member were employed as counsel, on that occasion, for Mr. Osborne, and one of them actually cross-examined the evidence; it must therefore be supposed that, from the exalted station of that gentleman, every industry would be used, every exertion be made by them, as well to clear the character of their client in Georgia as to establish the right of the sitting member here. It was, he said, a decision of the highest court of the State of Georgia, founded on an express article of the Constitution—a court having competent jurisdiction to decide, and an authority which the members of that State here were not only called on to acknowledge, but to respect. A decision of factum, he said, it could not be supposed, for whoever heard of a unanimous faction? Faction signified a party in a State; here was a political phenomenon, which did not happen in a political age—a whole people of one way of thinking—a House of Representatives unanimously convicting. How, he asked, should the voice of the people be known? Here were but two ways: by petition from the people at large, or by the declared sense of the Legislature. If he had taken the former, would not the gentleman have come forward to object to it? Would not there have been room to charge him with undue influence in procuring it? The voice of the people, therefore, would be best known by the Legislature of the State; for, notwithstanding the nice-splendored sophistry of the day, he could not distinguish between the people and the State. Who was the State, but the society which composed it? Who, then, were the people, but the State? Would Congress, then, not receive the sense of the State of Georgia? Would they hush that voice which says we are not represented? Would not the world perceive how short-lived Republican virtues were, and the British King behold acts for which they had denominated him a tyrant? The Government was founded on the basis of the States and people; and, at least, a decent respect should be so far paid them as to receive their complaints. If it be said that Congress have the sole power of judging of the returns, elections, and qualifications of its own members, without denying this position, he would beg leave to observe, there were powers delegated by the Constitution which were not exclusive; that a power was given to the States to prescribe the times, manner, and place, for holding the elections, but Congress might alter those regulations. Here, then, was a right in Congress which was not exercised; the States were in the exercise of this power; every member in the House had been elected under State laws; the State officers executed the laws; and who had the cognizance of their malfeasance but the States under whom those officers held their appointments? Besides, who, he asked, could so well detect corruption as the States, who were so much interested to do it? Could Congress detect this corruption? Would individuals hazard their lives and fortunes, at the end of every election, to attend Congress to inform them of it? Would Congress establish inquisitions in the respective States to find it out? Would the people of America submit to inquisitions? Had Congress the power to compel evidence to attend? Where was their law—where their compulsory process? He had seen neither. But, suppose all this got over, and corruption detected, can Congress punish the authors of it?

Here, again, he would ask for their law, their power to do so; and even then, could they dismiss the State officers convicted of corruption? Sir, added he, could the united wisdom of this House have removed Mr. Osborne from the bench of Georgia? Secure in his seat, he would have minded the fulminations of Congress no more than the fulminations of the Court of Rome. But, he supposed, it would be objected to on another ground, that it was not agreeable to the strict rules of law, and therefore inadmissible, as the parties were not the same. Although he admitted, in some degree, that the doctrine might hold, yet still it was not unfrequently allowed to admit decisions in other courts, on trials between other parties. Thus, for instance, a sentence of a court of admiralty, where goods had been condemned in a case of piracy, was admitted, as evidence, in an ecclesiastical court, was admitted. A sentence, in an ecclesiastical court, was admitted. A decree in chancery was not usually admitted as common law. And he recollected one strong case, where a judgment of ouster against the bailiffs of a corporation was admitted as evidence against the person claiming a title under their election. This last case was precisely in point, and he begged leave to impress it on the House, and the sitting member claiming under the return of Mr. Osborne. He acknowledged the advantage the learned counsel had of him here, having his books to resort to, but he did not mean to rest fully on those cases, because he conceived the House bound by their own laws, and not by the laws of any inferior court; but where could be the danger of admitting it? Were the House a common jury, liable to be imposed on by artifice, or biased by prejudice, they could not examine the evidence, reject what ought to be rejected, and suffer that to impress them which ought to impress them.

Here Mr. LEWIS objected to the admission of these papers, and was astonished that they should be offered to the House. He argued that the impeachment of Judge Osborne was unconnected with the business in question; that it was altogether ex parte, and therefore hoped the House would reject it, and not suffer the proceedings of the State of Georgia, dignified as it was, to influence Congress in a matter which was entirely within their own jurisdiction. The House refused to receive them. Whereupon the farther hearing on the said trial was adjourned until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 14.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments to the bill entitled "An act to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions," and have made a farther amendment to the said bill; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

plaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia; and the Counsel for the sitting member having concluded his defence, the petitioner was heard in reply; after which, the parties retired from the bar.

A motion was then made and seconded, "That certain proceedings of the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, accompanied with other papers, transmitted agreeably to their resolution, under the signature of the Governor and the seal of the State, relative to the election of a member to represent the Eastern District of the said State in this House, be received."

On which motion, the previous question being called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question to agree to the said motion be now put?" it passed in the negative, and so the said motion was lost.

An adjournment was then called for and carried.

FRIDAY, March 16.

The House proceeded to a decision on the contested election in the case of the petition of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia; and, after debate thereon, a motion being made and seconded that the House do agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That ANTHONY WAYNE was not duly elected a Member of this House."

It was unanimously resolved in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, every member present voting in the affirmative.

Another motion was then made and seconded, "That the SPEAKER do transmit a copy of the said vote to the Executive of the State of Georgia;" and, debate arising thereon, Ordered, That all farther decision on the said contested election be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petitions of the Commissioners of Loans for the States of New Hampshire and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill entitled "An act to ascertain and regulate the claims to half-pay and to invalid pensions." Whereupon, Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreement to the said amendments, and doth agree to all the amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also, upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," which was made to this House on Tuesday, the 6th instant, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

SATURDAY, March 17.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of the Ministers and Trustees of the Lutheran church in Rheland township, Chester county, in the State of Pennsylvania; also, on the petition of the Wardens of the Calvinist church, in Vincent township, in the county and State aforesaid; and on the petition of the Corporation of Trustees of the public Grammar school and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report concerning the additional supplies requisite for the ensuing year, made pursuant to a resolution of the House of the 8th instant; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Attorney General of the United States, enclosing his report on the petition of Andrew Jackson; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to amend an act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," so far as to permit the landing of salt, under certain regulations, at warehouses belonging to the several fisheries, and to allow a drawback on the exportation of salted provisions equal to the duty that is paid on the salt used in preserving the same; and that Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. KEY, and Mr. PARKER, be the said committee.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives, after the 3d day of March, 1797." Whereupon, the first amendment being read, and the question put, that this House doth agree to the same, as follows:

Section first, between the words "of" and "members," insert "one hundred and twenty:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, John Brown, William Findley, William B. Giles, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Philip Key, Richard Bland Lee, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, John Page, Josiah Parker, Joshua Seney, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

The other amendments of the Senate to the said bill were then severally read; and, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendments; and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, and Mr. BALDWIN, be appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

MONDAY, March 19.

A petition of John Macpherson, setting forth that he has discovered an infallible method of ascertaining the longitude, to a degree of precision far beyond any former discovery; and praying that Congress will enable him to prove his theory by experiments in a voyage to France.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the conference proposed by this House, on the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill entitled "An act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 3d day of March, 1797," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part. The Senate recede from some, and insist on other of their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of certain widows, orphans, invalids, and other persons." The Senate have also passed a bill entitled "An act to erect a light-house on Montauk Point, in the State of New York;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances barred by the limitations heretofore established," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of a further decision on the contested election, in the case of the petition of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia; and, a motion being made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner, JAMES JACKSON, is entitled to a seat in this House, as a member for the lower district of the State of Georgia; and that the right of petitioning against the election of the said JAMES JACKSON be reserved to all persons, at any time during the term for which he was elected."

Debate thereon ensued; when an adjournment being called for, the several orders of the day were further postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 20.

A bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on Montauk Point, in the State of New York," was read twice and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the settlement of the claims of persons, under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain widows, orphans, invalids, and other persons," which were disagreed to by this House and insisted on by the Senate; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreements to the said amendments, and doth agree to the same.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, on the contested election in the case of the petition of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia.

Mr. W. SMITH proposed the following resolution, viz:

"That the seat of ANTHONY WAYNE, as a member of this House, is vacant; and that notice be served on the Executive of the State of Georgia, in order that he may issue a writ for a new election."

This motion was objected to as not being sufficiently comprehensive to express the sense of the House. On the contrary, it seemed to be intended to prevent the introduction of a resolution which was proposed by Mr. GILES, viz:

Resolved, That James Jackson is entitled to a seat in this House."

To both of those motions several amendments, substitutes, &c., were proposed; and Mr. GILES's motion was modified so as to read thus:

Resolved, That JAMES JACKSON is duly elected, and, therefore, entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. GILES supported this motion by a train of judicious and well applied arguments, drawn from the precedents of the British Government; he particularly mentioned the Middlesex election, when Mr. Wilkes was expelled the House of Commons, for having been tried and found guilty of an abominable libel; in which case a writ for a new election was issued, because there was not then any other candidate: but when afterwards there was a candidate set up against Mr. Wilkes, the House of Commons did not order a new writ to issue, they declared the other candidate duly elected, having previously decided that Mr. Wilkes was ineligible to a seat in the House. This, although it may not be reckoned exactly a case in point, comes something near to the Georgia election; and from this and a variety of other cases, which Mr. G. quoted, he thought the House would be highly justifiable in declaring Mr. JACKSON duly elected, and therefore entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives. Mr. G. further observed, that the consequence of not agreeing to the resolution he had the honor to propose, would be a disavowal of the right of the judicial powers of the House in cases where they were to decide on the qualifications of their own members; and it would be transferring those powers to the Executives of the States, if Mr. SMITH's motion should obtain.

Mr. W. SMITH rose to oppose Mr. GILES's motion, and entered into a very extensive chain of argument on the rights of election, the powers of Congress, the danger of foreclosing the chair of the sitting member, should he desire to impeach the validity of the petitioner's election; the want of reciprocity that would ensue from an adoption of the resolution; the danger of so bad a precedent; the deprivation of the rights of Georgia to hold a new election to fill the vacancy, &c., &c. He also quoted almost all the cases of contested elections in Great Britain, and drew inferences from each in favor of his own opinion. He said the business before the House was not to take cognizance of Mr. JACKSON's right to a seat, it had been no more than to investigate the legality of Mr. WAYNE's seat, which was now decided in the negative; it was not a contest between Mr. WAYNE and Mr. JACKSON, but an inquiry into a return.

Mr. GILES proposed to amend his motion, by adding these words, "and that the right of petitioning against the said election (of JAMES JACKSON) be preserved to all persons, &c., within the time for which he was elected."

Mr. MADISON replied generally to all the reasoning of the gentlemen who had gone before him in this business; he mentioned the general rule, that whosoever had a majority of sound votes was the legal Representative; he then recited the several exceptions to this rule, and expatiated on the lex parliamentaria. In addition to the cases quoted by Mr. GILES and Mr. W. SMITH, he mentioned one wherein corruption appeared in both candidates, and the seat was adjudged to him who had the greatest number of sound votes; but this, he said, was not a case exactly in point: he therefore believed it would be necessary to decide the present one agreeably to the Constitution and right reason. He had ventured an opinion formerly upon an occasion of this kind, and he would now confess that if the House could, conformably to reason, precedents, or convenience, admit the petitioning member to a seat, he believed that they ought to do it, in order to fill up the chasm in the House, so far as relates to the representation and interest of the State of Georgia. He differed in opinion with those who had argued that the petitioner had not claimed his seat; and even admitting he had done so, or that he would resign or refuse to accept it, still the House are bound to declare and establish his right. The House now adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 21.

A petition of sundry merchants of the State of Rhode Island, trading to India and China, was presented to the House and read, praying that teas imported from Europe in vessels the property of citizens of the United States, may be subjected to the same duties and regulations as teas imported from India in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States. Ordered, that the said petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Ordered, That the report of the Attorney General on the petition of Andrew Jackson, be committed to Mr. CLARK, Mr. STEELE, and Mr. LIVERMORE.

Ordered, That the Message, of yesterday, from the President of the United States, be committed to Mr. WHITE, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, with instructions to report thereon by way of bill or bills.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for fixing the compensation of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion on the contested election in the case of the petition of JAMES JACKSON, complaining of an undue election and return of ANTHONY WAYNE, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia.

Mr. BOURNOR rose to deliver his opinion; previous to which, he thought proper to recapitulate most of the circumstances which have come into view, before the House, from the time of receiving Mr. JACKSON's petition to the present time, of declaring whether he is, or is not, entitled to the seat in the House of Representatives. He took particular notice that there were only two candidates for the lower district of Georgia; no third candidate had been set up. Hence, as there were only two, and one of them has been proved to be illegally elected, it remains to be decided whether the other be entitled to his seat. He observed, that in three of the counties the whole of their elections were null and void; and that, with respect to the others, all the evidence which would be necessary to an investigation had not been yet before the House, as no other evidence had been adduced but such as was thought necessary to vacate the contested seat; consequently, the evidence admitted in one case cannot be admitted in the other; and if Congress proceed in the question now under consideration, they must do it without the cognizance of Georgia, and without any return by them made in favor of the petitioner. Besides, it will be doing an essential injury to the sitting member, should it appear that he had a majority of votes exclusive of all the illegal ones, as it will be precluding him from all redress, to declare the petitioner the sitting member.

Mr. B. also quoted the case of the Maryland election of Mr. PINKNEY, who had resigned; yet the next candidate in number of votes was not declared; a new election was held. Upon the whole, after considerable time spent in reasoning nearly on similar grounds with those of Mr. W. SMITH, he concluded by declaring that he was apprehensive the House would be acting rather precariously should they attempt any decision at present on the resolution proposed.

Here Mr. BOURNOR proposed to read a paper in his place, containing information which he said was necessary to support the opinions he had advanced, and which paper went to prove that there was not a majority of votes in favor of the petitioner after deducting the illegal votes. Several members opposed the reading of these papers, and some asked why these papers had not been produced on the trial? To this it was replied by Mr. W. SMITH, that this testimony was not then necessary; it was also observed, that in case Mr. WAYNE's testimony should prove so many illegal votes against Mr. JACKSON, that, after all the bad votes were left out on both sides, it should appear that Mr. WAYNE had a majority notwithstanding; the House would be driven into a dilemma, for it might be demanded of them to declare his election illegal after the House had already declared it illegal. Under these circumstances, it was judged improper to produce the evidence proposed to be read by Mr. BOURNOR; and he accordingly withdrew it, and proceeded to make some further observations on the impropriety of agreeing to the motion under consideration.

Mr. LIVERMORE expressed some regret at the situation into which the House was driven in this business. He quoted the election laws of Britain, and drew several inferences therefrom, as the only precedents that could enable Congress to form a judgment. He also observed that special regard ought to be paid to the election law of Georgia. From the whole of his arguments, it appeared that unless a majority of votes in favor of Mr. JACKSON had been returned to the Governor, and from him transmitted officially to the Speaker, &c., he could not suppose him entitled to a seat.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was of opinion that, until such time as Congress enacted a law for regulating elections, there was no other rule to go by than the laws of the States; under this impression, he joined in opinion with Mr. LIVERMORE.

The question being now taken that this House doth agree to the said motion, amended to read as follows:

"Resolved, That JAMES JACKSON is entitled to take a seat in this House, and that the right of petitioning against the election of the said JAMES JACKSON, be referred to all persons, at any time during the term for which he was elected."

It passed in the negative—yeas 29, nays 29—the House being equally divided.

And Mr. SPEAKER declaring himself with the nays—the yeas and nays, as demanded by one-fifth of the members present, were as follows:

YEAS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, John Brown, Abraham Clark, William Findley, Elbridge Gerry, William B. Giles, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Daniel Heister, Israel Jacobs, Richard Bland Lee, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, John Page, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Resolved, That the seat of ANTHONY WAYNE, as a member of this House, is, and the same is declared to be, vacant.

Ordered, That the SPEAKER transmit a copy of the preceding resolution, and of this order, to the Executive of the State of Georgia, to the end that the said Executive may issue writs of election to fill the said vacancy.

THURSDAY, March 22.

A memorial of sundry public creditors, who loaned money to the United States between September, 1777, and March, 1778, was presented to the House and read, praying that the modification of their claims, suggested in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the present session on the subject of the public debt, may be adopted. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Public Debt.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for fixing the compensations of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress," was read the first time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Laurens, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of George Turner, one of the Judges of the Territory Northwest of the River Ohio, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, on the subject of a report on the commerce and navigation of the United States with foreign nations; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of Benjamin Stiles, in behalf of himself and his associates, was presented to the House and read, praying that the contract between the United States and John Cleves Symmes may be so far varied, as to include the purchase made by the memorialist and his associates of the said Symmes, and to quiet them in their title and possession of the same.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Directors of the Ohio Company of Associates; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. MADISON, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to attend a conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives, after the 3d day of March, 1797," reported that the managers had, according to order, attended to that duty, and that, after offering the reasons for disagreement on the part of this House, and hearing those which were offered by the managers on the part of the Senate in answer thereto, several propositions, offered by the managers on the part of this House, for accommodating the said disagreement, not being acceded to by the managers on the part of the Senate, they had mutually determined to separate from the said conference without agreement.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 3d day of March, 1797."

FRIDAY, March 23.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of George Turner, one of the Judges of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the laws of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio be printed under the inspection of the Secretary of State, and delivered to the Governor and Judges, to be distributed for the information of the inhabitants; that the official duties of the Secretary of the said Territory be under the control of the laws of the Territory; that the Governor and Judges have power to repeal their laws, if found to be improper; that a single Judge, in the absence of the other Judges, be authorized to hold a Court; that the Secretary of State provide seals for the said Territory; that the military power be subordinate to the civil power; that the limitation act, passed by the Governor and Judges of said Territory the 28th day of December, 1788, ought to be repealed by Congress; that certain expenses incurred by two of the Judges in purchasing a boat to carry the Judges and soldiers, as an escort on the circuit, and also for sending an express, amounting to —, ought to be paid by the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. WHITE, Mr. WILLIAMSON, and Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for altering the times of holding the Circuit Courts in certain districts of the United States, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A petition of Christian George Elholm was presented to the House and read, stating that he had discovered the cause of the motions and variation of the magnetic needle, and praying the patronage of Congress to aid him with the means of making experimental proofs and demonstration of his theory; or that he may now receive compensation as the survivor of five captors, who, during the late war, took and captured one hundred and eleven British regulars, one hundred and twenty-seven stand of arms, five armed vessels, mounted with thirty-six four-pounders, and manned with forty sailors, together with swivels, provisions, and other articles, all which were delivered for the use of the Army.

Ordered, That the said petition, so far as it respects a claim for services rendered during the late war, be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The House proceeded to consider the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of the Trustees of the Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said report and petition be referred to Mr. Vining, Mr. MENCER, and Mr. ASH; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes; and after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. SENEY reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill for finishing the light-house on Baldhead, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. SENEY reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom were referred the petitions of the merchants of the cities of New York and Philadelphia, importers of teas. Whereupon,

Resolved, That, for all teas imported into the United States since the 3d day of March, 1791, the duties whereon shall have been bonded, payable in one year, it shall be lawful for the officers of the customs to whom such bonds were given, to cancel the same, and to take other bonds in lieu thereof, payable in two years, (from the time of the importation of the teas for which the same is given): Provided, That such teas are deposited with the proper officer, agreeably to the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1791.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. GERRY, do prepare and bring in the same.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendments proposed by the Senate, which were disagreed to by this House and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the first Enumeration, and making provision for another Enumeration, and an Apportionment of Representatives thereon, to compose the House of Representatives after the 3d day of March, 1797. Whereupon,

The question being taken, that this House doth recede from their disagreement to all the said amendments, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 29, as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the Executors of Edward Carnes, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, March 24.

An engrossed bill for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John C. Symmes, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for finishing the light-house on Baldhead, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina, was read the third time and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the Circuit Courts in certain districts of the United States, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and committed.

A petition of the officers of the Massachusetts line of the late Army was presented to the House and read, praying that the subject-matter of a petition presented at the last session, representing the losses they sustained in the mode of compensation for their military services, may now be taken into consideration and relief granted. Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States,'" and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House; and then the bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS from the committee appointed, presented a bill to extend the time heretofore granted for the payment of the duties on certain teas imported after the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; which was received, read twice, and committed.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A MINT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States." The following amendment being under consideration, viz: "In the tenth section, strike out the words 'Or representation of the head of the President of the United States for the time being, with an inscription, which shall express the initial or first letter of his Christian or first name, and his surname at length, the succession of the Presidency numerically,' and, in lieu thereof, insert, 'Emblematic of Liberty,' with an inscription of the word LIBERTY."

Mr. PAGE, in support of this motion said, that it had been a practice in Monarchies to exhibit the figures or heads of their Kings upon their coins, either to hand down in the ignorant ages in which this practice was introduced, a kind of chronological account of their Kings, or to show to whom the coin belonged. We have all read, that the Jews paid tribute to the Romans, by means of a coin on which was the head of their Caesar. Now as we have no occasion for this aid to history, nor any pretence to call the money of the United States the money of our Presidents, there can be no sort of necessity for adopting the idea of the amendment proposed; and the more readily because I am certain it will be more agreeable to the citizens of the United States, to see the head of Liberty on their coin, than the heads of Presidents. However well pleased they might be with the head of the great man now their President, they may have no great reason to be pleased with some of his successors; as to him, they have his busts, his pictures everywhere; historians are daily celebrating his fame, and Congress have voted him a monument. A further compliment they need not pay him, especially when it may be said, that no Republic has paid such a compliment to their Chief Magistrate; and when indeed it would be viewed by the world as a stamp of Royalty on our coins; would wound the feelings of many friends, and gratify our enemies.

Mr. WILLIAMSON seconded the motion also, and affirmed that the Romans did not put the heads of their Consuls on their money; that Julius Caesar wished to have his on the Roman coin, but only ventured to cause the figure of an elephant to be impressed thereon; that by a pun on the Carthaginian name of that animal, which sounded like the name of Caesar, he might be said to be on the coin. He thought the amendment consistent with Republican principles, and therefore approved of it.

Mr. LIVERMORE ridiculed, with an uncommon degree of humor, the idea that it could be of any consequence to the United States whether the head of Liberty were on their coins or not; the President was a very good emblem of Liberty; but what an emblematical figure might be, he could not tell. A ghost had been said to be in the shape of the sound of a drum, and so might Liberty for aught he knew; but how the President's head being on our coins could affect the Liberty of the People, was incomprehensible to him. He hoped, therefore, that the amendment would be rejected.

Establishment of a Mint.

[H. or R.]

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, agreed with Mr. LIVERMORE in opinion; adding, that the President representing the people of the United States, might with great propriety represent them on their coins. He denied that Republics did not place the images of their Chief Magistrates on their coins; and said, he was surprised that a member who so much admired the French and their new Constitution, should be so averse to a practice they have established; the head of their King is by their Constitution put upon their money. Besides, it was strange that for a circumstance so trivial we should lose time in debating, and risk the loss of an important bill.

The said amendment was again read, and a division of the question thereon called for: Whereupon,

The question being taken, that the House do agree to the first part of the said amendment, for striking out the words "or representation of the head of the President of the United States for the time being, with an inscription, which shall express the initial or first letter of his Christian or first name, and his surname at length, the succession of the Presidency numerically;"—it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 22, as follows:

And then the question being taken that the House do agree to the second part of the said amendment, for inserting, in lieu of the words stricken out, the words, "Emblematic of Liberty, with an inscription of the word Liberty;"—it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 42, nays 6, as follows:

YAS.—Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Benjamin Bourne, John Brown, Abraham Clark, Thomas Fitzsimons, William B. OHIO COMPANY OF ASSOCIATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of the Directors of the Ohio Company of Associates; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That the title ought to be made to the Ohio Company for so much of the lands in their contracts as they have actually paid for.

"Resolved, That, in addition to the above quantity of land, there be also granted to the said Ohio Company, two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres, being the proportion they were, by a resolve of Congress, authorized to pay in army rights, upon their delivering to the Secretary of the Treasury army rights sufficient for the purpose; and that there be also granted to the said company, in addition to the before-mentioned tracts, one hundred thousand acres, to make good one thousand lots of one hundred acres each, appropriated by the said company as bounties to such as might become settlers within the said purchase, upon condition, nevertheless, that the said company shall make good such bounties, as well to future settlers as to those already settled.

"Resolved, That a title be made to the said company for the remainder of the one million five hundred thousand acres contracted for, upon their paying into the Treasury of the United States a sum not exceeding — cents per acre for the same, with interest from the passing an act for that purpose." Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. BENSON, Mr. LEARNED, and Mr. BALDWIN, do prepare and bring in the same.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A MINT.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," and agree to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill entitled "An act supplemental to the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States."

It was moved that the House should recede from their amendment to the bill entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States."

Mr. LIVERMORE supported the motion. He said he did not conceive it possible that any friend to the President of the United States, the Chief Magistrate, that great and good man, would have refused to pay every tribute of respect which was justly due to him. We have now a favorable opportunity of complimenting him, without any shadow of flattery, and without any expense. But, instead of this, what is proposed? An emblematical figure of Liberty. But what is this Liberty which some appear to be so fond of? He had no idea of such Liberty as appears to possess the minds of some gentlemen. It is little better than the liberty of savages—a relinquishment of all law that contradicts or thwarts their passions or desires. His idea of Liberty was that which arose from law and justice, which secured every man in his proper and social rights. Some gentlemen may think a bear broke loose from his chain a fit emblem of Liberty; others may devise a different emblem; but he could not conceive that any of them would be applicable to the situation of the United States, which justly boasted of being always free. If any idea of an emblem is necessary, he thought it might be applied to the head of the President of the United States. The present occasion affords the best opportunity of doing honor to the man we love; instead of which, we offer him an affront. He could not reconcile this conduct to propriety or consistency; for, while it is proposed to raise a monument to the memory of the President, which will cost fifty thousand guineas, a proposition to honor him in a more effectual manner, and in a way which will be satisfactory to the people, without any expense, and with perfect security to their liberties, is objected to. He hoped the House would recede.

Mr. MERCER replied to Mr. LIVERMORE with some degree of asperity. He observed that there was a rule in the British House of Commons that the name of the King should never be mentioned in any debate. He thought some such rule might be introduced with advantage into this House. In the course of his remarks, to show that the circumstance of having the President's head stamped on the coin could not be justly considered as doing him an honor, he said, that persons of no better character than a Nero, a Caligula, or a Helio-gabalus, may enjoy it as well as a Trajan, &c. Mr. SENEY animadverted with severity on the remarks offered by Mr. LIVERMORE, and on the conduct of the Senate; particularly in returning the bill with a negative to the amendment of the House, within a period that left them no time to deliberate on the reasons which might have influenced the House.

Mr. GILES opposed the motion for receding. He adverted to the ideas which are connected with the subject in European countries. The President's head will not designate the Government. There is to be but one head; but does not our Government consist of three parts? Is there any other head proposed to be on the coin but the President's? He said this circumstance was of a piece with the first act of the Senate. It had a near affinity to titles, that darling child of the Senate, which has been put to nurse, with an intention that it shall be announced at some future period in due form.

Mr. BENSON said, he supposed he should be extremely disorderly were he to mention the motives which influenced the Senate in their discussions. He knew not what they were, nor was it of importance that he should. He then observed, that plain pieces of metal will not answer for money; some impression is necessary to guard against counterfeits. The Senate have determined what the device shall be; but the House, by their amendment, have left the matter entirely to the judgment of the artist, who may form such an emblem as suits his fancy. Mr. B. ridiculed the idea of the people's being enslaved by their Presidents, and much less by his image on their coin.

Mr. PAGE replied that he was sorry to find that some gentlemen endeavored to ridicule Republican cautions. He thought it both indelicate and inconsistent with their situations, as well as highly impolitic. He confessed that, as long as the people were sensible of the blessings of liberty, and had their eyes open to watch encroachments, they would not be enslaved; but if they should ever shut them, or become inattentive to their interests and the true principles of a free Government, they, like other nations, might lose their liberties; that it was the duty of the members of that House to keep the eyes of their constituents open, and to watch over their liberties. It was therefore unbecoming a member to treat with levity and to ridicule any sentiment which had that tendency. For his part, he thought it the peculiar duty of the Representative of a free people to put them upon their guard against anything which could possibly endanger their liberties. That with this view he warned his constituents of the danger, not merely of imitating the flattery and almost idolatrous practice of Monarchies with respect to the honor paid to their Kings, by impressing their images and names on their coins, but he wished to add as few incentives as possible to competitors for the President's place. He warned his country against the cabals, the corruption, and animosities, which might be excited by the intrigues of ambitious men, animated with the hope of handing their names down to the latest ages on the medals of their country. But this indiscriminate honor is unworthy of the President's acceptance. A Nero, a Caligula, a Helio-gabalus, it has been observed, [by Mr. MERCER,] may enjoy it as well as a Trajan. To apply it to the present Chief Magistrate, alone, would be less exceptionable. But this would be highly improper; for, if he should pass an act for this purpose, it might blast his reputation. I am of opinion that the Senate knew his delicacy would not permit him to pass such an one. They have therefore extended the compliment to all his successors. We are under obligations to the great man now our President; but a lover of Liberty and friend to the Rights of Man, would be cautious how he showed his sense of that obligation. As a friend to the President, I am unwilling to offer him a compliment which, if accepted, might damn his reputation. Were I in his place, I would cut off my hand rather than it should sign the act as it now stands. Were I his greatest enemy, I should wish him to pass it as it was passed by the Senate. Sir, I am as much his friend as the member from New Hampshire, and have shown, at proper times and places, that I was so. I am too sensible of the honor our President has acquired to suppose that an unbecoming compliment can in any degree contribute to its increase. I hope, therefore, the amendment which the House has made will not be receded from.

The question being now put, that this House doth recede from the said amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, John W. Resolved, That this House doth adhere to the said amendment.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

TUESDAY, March 27.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their disagreement 2d Con.—17

Defeat of the Army under General St. Clair.

[H. or R.]

to the amendment adhered to by this House to the bill entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States."

DEFEAT OF THE ARMY UNDER GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to institute an inquiry into the causes of the late defeat of the army under the command of Major General St. Clair; and also into the causes of the detentions or delays which are suggested to have attended the money, clothing, provisions, and military stores, for the use of the said army, and into such other causes as may, in any manner, have been productive of the said defeat."

Mr. VINING inquired what was the object of the resolution? In what way was it to be carried into execution? For, if the House is not furnished with some answer to these inquiries, he did not see how gentlemen could vote for it. He conceived that this indefinite mode of procedure would only embarrass the President, without producing the desired effect. He was in favor of a full and complete investigation of the subject; and, if there has been any deficiency, let those who are to blame be impeached. He was not disposed to screen any officer from justice, let him be of what rank he may; but he was not satisfied with the mode now proposed. He did not consider it as constitutional or practicable.

Mr. BOUNDINOT said, he was surprised to hear the gentleman from Delaware express a doubt of the practicability of instituting an inquiry into the late unfortunate business in the mode proposed. For his part, he saw no such difficulties in the way, as appeared to the gentleman. Mr. B. then stated certain complaints which existed, and were currently reported—such as a failure of the contracts, and, for aught that appeared to the contrary, the misfortunes of the army may be traced to that cause. Other complaints are circulated, respecting which the public have a right to be satisfied. The present proposition goes no further than a simple request. Having signified the wish of the House, the President may adopt such measures in relation to the subject as he may see proper.

Mr. GILES supported his motion. He conceived that the inquiry was indispensable, and the mode proposed strictly proper. The business must begin somewhere. This House is the proper source, as the immediate guardians of the public interest. Mr. VINING rose to explain. He stated various difficulties which would impede the progress of the matter in the informal mode proposed. These, he observed, were so great as to involve an impossibility of prosecuting the investigation to any purpose. He supposed that a more proper and constitutional way would be to call on the Heads of Departments to give an account of their conduct.

Mr. CLARK observed, that it was evident the public mind was greatly agitated. An inquiry was necessary. If the mode proposed should not prove agreeable or convenient to the President, he will let us know it.

Mr. W. SMITH observed, that this was the first instance of a proposition on the part of this House to inquire into the conduct of officers who are immediately under the control of the Executive. In this view of the subject, the resolution proposed could not but be considered as an impeachment of the conduct of the First Magistrate. Mr. S. then adverted to the division of the powers of the Government expressly provided for in the Constitution. Gentlemen have discovered great solicitude to keep the branches separate and distinct; but, on this occasion, from the consideration that this House is the grand inquest of the nation, they seem to discover a disposition to go into a similar mode of conduct with the National Assembly of France, who spent a whole night in examining a drum major. He would not say that they had not a right so to do, but he believed no gentleman would justify such a line of conduct on the part of this House. He then particularized the several objects of inquiry in relation to the present subject. He showed that the Constitution had made provision in all the several cases. And as it was the duty of the President of the United States to carry the laws into execution, it ought to be shown that he has been remiss in his duty, before he is called on in this way. He noted the account published by the Secretary of War, by direction of the President, and considered as his act. After several other remarks, Mr. S. concluded by saying that, in any case where it shall appear that the Supreme Executive has not done his duty, he should be fully in favor of an inquiry; but, till that was done, he trusted the measure would not be adopted, without at least a previous and full discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said, he doubted the propriety of the resolution, in its present form; but was fully of opinion that an inquiry into the expenditure of all public money was the indispensable duty of this House. He proposed the appointment of a select committee to inquire and report.

Mr. KITTERA moved to amend the resolution by substituting a select committee.

Mr. VENABLE was in favor of the original motion. He conceived that it was the only proper mode of proceeding. Nor had he any apprehension that the President would consider it as encroaching in the smallest degree.

Mr. GILES contended that his motion was so far from tending to blend the several branches of Government, that its effect would be the reverse.

Mr. STEELE said, he was indifferent as to the mode, provided the matter was fully gone into. The gentleman from South Carolina has mentioned the Report of the Secretary of War, and has said that it is considered as the act of the President of the United States. Mr. S. denied that it was the President's act. It was not satisfactory. Will any gentleman on this floor say it is satisfactory to him? He enumerated several articles of complaint, and observed that he had no great doubt that an inquiry would lead to an impeachment. Justice to the public, and the officers particularly concerned, loudly demands an inquiry.

Mr. VINING here moved that the resolution should be committed to a select committee.

Mr. BONDINOT objected to the idea of a committee. He said the time would not admit of it. Witnesses are perhaps eight hundred miles off. What progress can a committee make in such a business? He denied that it was the duty of the President to institute the inquiry, unless he was requested to do it. The magnitude of the objects of inquiry would involve such an expense that the President would not be justified in incurring it, unless he was authorized by the House. He then stated some particulars to show the practicability of the measure—among others, that there were a sufficient number of officers present to form what is denominated a Court of Inquiry.

Mr. BARNWELL was opposed to the original motion. He considered it as informal, and suggested what he considered as the proper mode of procedure, which was, to call on the several officers of Government for such information as may be necessary. He was against the commitment. The motion for a select committee was negatived.

The question then was on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, he believed this was the first time that it was ever contemplated to appoint a Court Martial to inquire into the expenditure of public money.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he conceived that several parts of the resolution were improper. He thought that it was entirely out of order to request the President of the United States to institute a Court Martial or a Court of Inquiry. The reasons and propriety of such Courts are better and more fully known to the President than to the members of the House. He was in favor of a committee to inquire relative to such objects as come properly under the cognizance of this House, particularly respecting the expenditures of public money; and if the resolution should be disagreed to, as he hoped it would, he should then move for such a committee.

Mr. BALDWIN said he had made up his mind on the subject. He was convinced the House could not proceed but by a committee of their own. Such a committee would be able to throw more light on the subject, and then the House would be able to determine how to proceed; and, if any failure had taken place on the part of the Executive officers, he should then be prepared to address the President, and to request him to take the proper steps in the case.

Mr. SENEY advocated the resolution, and urged several objections against a committee.

Mr. HARTLEY said, as it was probable some degree of odium would fall on those who might vote against this resolution, he thought proper to give some reasons, why he should vote against it. These were similar to what had been offered by several other gentlemen against the resolution, as being improper and informal.

Mr. MADISON started some difficulties in the case. He said the House ought to deliberate well, before they requested the President to do a thing which he had it not in his power to do. It was evident that the object of a Court Martial or Court of Inquiry must be to elucidate facts which would require the presence of officers, who could not possibly give their attendance in season to meet the object of the resolution. He made some further remarks, and then the question on the resolution was put, when—

A division of the said motion was called for; and the question being put, that the House do agree to the first clause thereof, in the words following:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to institute an inquiry into the causes of the late defeat of the Army under the command of Major General St. Clair.”

It passed in the negative—yeas 21, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS.—John Baptist Ashe, Elias Bondinot, Abraham Clark, William Findley, William B. Giles, Benjamin Goodhue, Daniel Heister, Aaron Kitchell, Richard Bland Lee, Nathaniel Macon, John Page, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Joshua Seney, Thomas Sumpter, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, Thomas Treadwell, Abraham Venable, Artemas Ward, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, John Brown, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Philip Key, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, John Vining, Alexander White, and Hugh Williamson.

And so the said motion was rejected.

Another motion was then made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair; and that the said committee be empowered to call for such persons, papers, and records, as may be necessary to assist their inquiries.”

And the question being put that the House do agree to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 44, nays 10, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Benjamin Goodhue, James Hillhouse, John Page, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Israel Smith, William Smith, and Thomas Sumpter.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GILES, Mr. STEELE, Mr. MERCER, Mr. VINING, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. SEDGWICK, be appointed the said committee.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War return the petitions presented to this House by invalids and others, whose cases are comprehended in the provision of any act of the present session, with the papers accompanying the said petitions, which have been referred to them, and are now in their respective offices; and that the several petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of the officers of the levies late in the service of the United States. Whereupon,

That part of the said report in the words following:

“That the said officers are entitled to a similar bounty allowed to the officers of the regiments, for each recruit by them enlisted; and that a special provision be made therefor,” being read, was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Resolved, That the said petition be rejected.

WEDNESDAY, March 28.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom were referred the Treasurer's accounts of receipts and expenditures of the public moneys, from the 1st October to the 31st December, 1791, inclusive, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the returns of duties arising on imports and tonnage for one year, ending the 30th September last, and a return of exports to the same period; which was read, and ordered to be committed to Mr. PARKER, Mr. KEY, and Mr. GILMAN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled “An act for finishing the light-house on Baldhead, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina.”

Mr. STILES, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Attorney General on the petition of Andrew Jackson, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VINING, from the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petitions of the Minister and Trustees of the Lutheran Church in Rheland township, Chester county, in the State of Pennsylvania; of the Wardens of the Calvinist Church in Vincent township in the county and State aforesaid; and of the Trustees of the Grammar school and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of William Smith, of the town of Baltimore; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt.

Mr. GILES proposed a clause to be added to the first proposition offered by Mr. FRIZARDSON, the object of which was to preclude the admission of the irredeemable principle in the debt hereafter to be subscribed to the loan of the United States. Mr. G. supported his motion by adducing sundry reasons. The creditors, by not availing themselves in season of the chance of subscribing under the terms of the first subscription, the Government are under no obligation to renew those terms. He said his motion was to have a subsequent operation, and therefore cannot be considered as an infraction of existing contracts. The irredeemable principle, he observed, is an exotic, and appears to have been adopted without a due consideration of its applicability to our circumstances. The funding system of Great Britain has prostrated that Government. The prosperity of that country is not owing to its financial arrangements; Great Britain is in its decay; this Government is in its youth. It is improper for us to use such stimulants as may be necessary to induce vigor in age. The irredeemable quality is the result of necessity in the funding system of Great Britain; and that principle will operate its ruin. The argument drawn from a violation of contracts applies as well to the first system as to that now proposed; the reduction of the interest was a violation of the original contract.

He then entered into a consideration of the principle of equality, and showed from the present state of the debt, part of it being in the hands of those who were inimical to the cause which this Government contracted to support, the obligation of the Government to add to the gift, which in fact has already been made to these people, by infusing this irredeemable quality, may well be questioned. He added some further remarks, and concluded by saying, he hoped that a principle which would be so fatal to the United States would be rejected, by adopting the proposition he offered. Mr. AMES offered various estimates, by which he demonstrated that funding the debt on the principle now opposed would not incapacitate the Government from discharging it; on the other hand, it would facilitate the object greatly.

Mr. LAURANCE observed, that the opposers of the proposed system, after offering various objections, appear at last to be agreed in a specific object. He denied that the consequences which it had been said resulted from the funding system of Great Britain had taken place. Adverting to the operation of the system in this country, he said the observations were no better founded. With respect to the irredeemable quality, it was not a novel circumstance: under the old Congress foreign loans had been made on a similar principle. It is well known that the old Congress contracted a debt which they could not discharge under ten years; and the payments then could be only made by instalments. No fault had ever been found with this transaction. He then entered into a general defence of the funding system; and, adverting to its operation, he showed what had been done. The credit of the country had been raised from the lowest ebb, and a larger sum of the debt had been paid off than any man in the country had any conception of. Here he noticed some remarks which had been made yesterday by a gentleman, who had said that the Secretary had insulted the House by his propositions; and said, in his opinion, such reflections were not merited by an officer who had done so much for his country. He defended the irredeemable principle, and showed the advantages which the country derived from it. He further remarked, that the Government was not precluded from exerting its faculties in discharging the debt or as great a degree as any person had proposed, and had been considered prudent; and while the United States are thus circumstanced, the doubt to the creditors, in the principle now opposed, is in fact no possible disadvantage to the Government.

Mr. MERCER said the funding system was not understood by the country at large, and he was not surprised when he found it was not understood in this House. He was glad, therefore, to hear observations thrown out, which served more fully to develop this system. The irredeemable quality he was astonished to hear advocated by any gentleman in this House; for sure he was that no measure of the Government was more odious elsewhere, or more universally execrated. He adverted to some of the financial operations of the British Government, and drew a comparison which placed the funding system of this country in a less eligible point of view than that of Great Britain. He said that by an easy process it could be made to appear that one-half, or at least one-third, of the six per cents might have been paid off, viz: by borrowing at three or four per cent. This is the mode which the British minister adopted. He showed, from certain statements, that this irredeemable quality operated to the injury of the holders of the three per cents of the United States. The British three per cents were at 100 per cent. for a number of years together. He denied that the loans which had been made by the old Government were on the irredeemable principle. He said the terms were in favor of the borrower on exactly similar principles with the contracts in common life. He introduced some observations of those who had written on the subject of finance. He said that funding systems had uniformly operated to the destruction of the common people; the principle has raised a splendid superstructure on no foundation whatever. He contrasted the situation of the modern with the ancient Dutch Republic. He stated the enviable situation of the Swiss Cantons; this, he said, was an eulogium on the steady produce of labor and industry.

Mr. GERRY stated his ideas on the irredeemable principle. He defended it on the grounds of justice and policy. He then adverted to the operation of the funding system. It had changed the whole face of our affairs—had transformed us from the vassals of foreign creditors to freemen—had revived the trade, agriculture, and manufactures of the country, and placed the credit of the United States on an equality with that of the most flourishing European Governments, and in a situation much superior to some of them.

Mr. HAISTEN, in a speech of some length, opposed the irredeemable principle, and the funding system in general.

Mr. FINDLEY said he was opposed to the irredeemable quality; he doubted whether it was not going beyond what is allowed by the Constitution. He had heard it often said, that principle was infused into the system on the idea of its being an equivalent for a reduction of the interest; this idea seems to be assumed by gentlemen, but he had not heard any of them adduce any reason in support of it. He did not think it in any degree an equivalent, nor did he think the creditors considered it in any such light. He was not unacquainted with many of the public creditors; they did not consider this as an equivalent; the debtors, in this case, assumed the office of judges, and they only considered what was an equivalent. He admitted that the debt was above par; but common interest had not declined; it was in fact higher than at any period during the war; this, he said, showed that the irredeemable quality was not an equivalent. Hence, he inferred the credit of the country was not supported by the funding system; the present credit of the country is a nominal and destructive credit; therefore, he insisted that, admitting the residue of the creditors to loan on this principle, will not be giving them an equivalent. He considered the funding system, from the first, as tending to the interest, not of the citizens, but of foreigners; it has given rise to one bubble after another, which have deluded our citizens to their destruction. He denied that it had increased the specie, or circulating medium, or raised the value of the lands, or promoted the manufactures or industry of the country. The reverse of all this, he said, were facts; credit between man and man is lessened; extravagance and immorality have spread their baneful influence. He then adverted to the system generally, and reprobated it as a departure from the original contract—that contract which was most solemnly guaranteed by the Constitution.

What is the obligation of the Government in respect to the residue of the debt? He conceived that the present Congress was perfectly clear to act agreeably to the principles of the original contract, as much so as the first Congress. In providing for the residue, he said the Government was bound to provide for it by a provision to pay six per cent., but not to pay interest on interest. Here he entered into a consideration of the policy of funding the facilities. This he reprobated, as unnecessarily increasing the public debt; and he could conceive of no other reason but that of increasing the debt which gave rise to this measure—a measure which ought not to have been adopted, and ought to have been prevented by the States doing their duty. He denied the right of one Congress to say that another shall not provide for paying off the whole of the debt, or of any part of it; for this reason he considered it unconstitutional, and should vote against the irredeemable quality. He had no doubt of the right of Congress to alter the funding system in regard to this principle, and that they would do it whenever they thought proper.

The question being put on Mr. GILES's motion, it was negatived—32 to 25.

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 30.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee to whom was referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying returns of the amount of duties arising on imports and tonnage for one year ending the 30th September last, and a return of exports for the same period, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petitions of the Minister and Trustees of the Lutheran church, in Rheland township, Chester county, in the State of Pennsylvania; of the Wardens of the Calvinist church in Vincent township, in the county and State aforesaid; and of the Trustees of the Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware; Whereupon,

That part of the said report, in the words following, was agreed to by the House, viz:

"That the sum of — be allowed for the use of the Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, and that provision by law be made for that purpose."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant thereto, and that Mr. VINING, Mr. MERCER, and Mr. ASH, do prepare and bring in the same. A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt.

The following resolution of Mr. FITZSIMONS, being under consideration, viz:

"Resolved, That the term for receiving on loan that part of the domestic debt of the United States which yet remains unsubscribed, be extended to the first day of next, on the same terms as was provided by the Act making provision for the Public Debt of the United States."

Mr. MERCER rose and offered a proposition to the Committee to the following effect: That the unsubscribed debt of the United States should be admitted to subscription on the following principles: "That subscribers should be entitled to stock of the United States for their principal debt, bearing an interest quarterly at the rate of five per cent. per annum, and, for the interest due thereon to the time of subscription, stock bearing an interest payable quarterly at the rate of three per cent. per annum, until redeemed," which being seconded by Mr. PARKER, Mr. MERCER proceeded to observe, that the resolution of the honorable member of Pennsylvania now before the Committee, and to which this was offered as an amendment, involved two questions, which, however united in form and blended in discussion, certainly required, by the just order of deliberation, a separate vote.

The first question was, Whether we should now propose a subscription on loan of the unsubscribed debt of the United States? And then the second would be, Whether we should pursue principles originating in speculative theory, and an experiment abandoned equally by bold projectors and blind admirers? such as those of the present Funding System.

The House was now free to act for the benefit of the United States. The holders had not come in by the time limited in the first proposal for subscription. They remained now creditors of the United States on the terms of the original contract, and if the United States proposed a new contract, they were at liberty to offer such as a full consideration of the subject and the benefits of experience now recommended.

The chief merit or demerit of the proposition before the Committee rested on the leading features of the old system. The funding a debt or transferring by way of mortgage to a particular class of persons, whether citizens or foreigners, the public resources, was, in its simplest form, a momentous measure; but, when complicated by principles unalterable and irrevocable by ourselves or posterity, it assumed an awful aspect.

Such principles had hitherto been adopted in a great measure without inquiry, and swallowed without hesitation, but they included all that was dear to society. They should be now developed, and the American mind thoroughly informed on the prominent features at least—the irredeemable quality, and the deferred stock.

Called upon to act, a mind in which nature had implanted the seeds of justice, would first well examine the right, and then cautiously consider the policy.

That Congress have the right at all of mortgaging the revenues of the Union, or laying a tax irrepealable or unalterable by a future Congress is at least questionable. In speaking of a right, I mean what can or cannot be rightfully done. I exclude all idea of force, violence, or breach of public faith. On a question of right, these considerations are withdrawn. If they can rightfully do it, they rightfully bind a next Congress; who cannot, if they ought not, either alter or annul the obligation. But if this right does exist, it does not extend to the admission of the principles of this resolution. That a deferred stock and an irredeemable quality are in violation of natural right, and of the Constitution of the United States, can, I think, be easily demonstrated.

Our natural reason, independent of the written Constitution, will tell us, that a Legislative Body, deriving authority from the same source, and under the same grant, must continue equal in power through every period of its existence. Different sessions have equal rights. If a preceding session could make laws which a subsequent session could not repeal, the Legislative power would be gradually abridged by the exercise, and eventually annihilated. The power of repeal is the renewing principle essential to its existence; and, although the mutability of human affairs may not require, and convenience may have suggested the rule that it should not be exercised during the same session, yet this rule does not destroy the right: it still is frequently and always will be exercised whenever occasion shall require it. But this right of repeal has never been doubted as applying to a subsequent session, except in the singular case of mortgaging revenues or laying an irrepealable tax. As this is the most important of all Legislative powers, and that which in fact includes all others, it demands serious attention. The existence of a nation depends on the possession of resources. These have their natural limits, beyond which they cannot be extended. A Legislative power of anticipating the public resources, or transferring the revenue, has no limits defined or prescribed until it arrives at the physical inability to raise more supply. They who anticipate are the judges of the exigencies of the State, and the extent of the funds required. But as exigencies will happen hereafter as well as now, and as Government will always have the natural right of subsisting itself, and providing for future exigencies, as they arrive, they will find the necessity, and with it the natural right of reversing the system ultimately, and of repealing the mortgages already made, to the extent that the necessity, in their judgment, may require. The right existing to undo what was done, decides this question, that nothing can have been rightfully done by the preceding Legislature, which the succeeding Legislature cannot as rightfully undo. A power then of mortgaging the public revenue or laying an irrepealable tax, being repugnant to natural reason, will, I trust, not be found in the letter of the Constitution of the United States, and will appear utterly inconsistent with its spirit.

Generally speaking, the Legislative power is conferred on the Congress of the United States; each succeeding session being equal to the Congress of the United States with the preceding, must derive equal rights from a grant confined and limited to no particular session. And in no particular part of the Constitution is any such power expressed or implied. It is not in the power of laying taxes; because this is laying taxes without repeal, and there is no such additional clause in the Constitution. The power of laying taxes is granted in the same manner as all the other specified powers. If they can exercise this rightfully without a power of repeal or modification, they may exercise all the powers in the same manner—they are all given in the same terms: this will not, I suppose be contended for.

Is such a power included in the power of paying the debts of the United States? I apprehend not. If Congress had the money, they might pay the debts, no doubt; but if they have not, and are obliged to resort to taxes to raise the money—as it is physically impossible to raise by their authority all the money, without interfering with the rights of a future Congress—all that is incumbent on them to do, is to raise as much as they can, and then the unperformed obligation descending upon the succeeding Legislature with equal force, constitutes the true and only real principles of public credit in a free Government; for, no theory will admit the position, nor will practice support the idea, that the principles of morality and the force of public faith will be confined to one session. Reason and experience show it, that these principles will aid a future Legislature as well as ourselves; they then will do as we have done, contrive to pay as much as they can. On this credit—a credit founded on the terms of the Constitution—the United States are empowered to borrow money; the Constitution is admitted as of notoriety; well understood by the money lenders. The same power was given to the old Congress, to borrow money on the credit of the United States; they confessedly had no power of mortgaging the resources of the Government, and laying an irrepealable tax, for they notoriously had no power of laying a tax at all. Yet they borrowed money abroad, before we could be considered as a nation, in the midst of a war, that shook the credit of an old established and opulent adversary; and they sustained a credit at home, which, however productive of individual losses, carried us triumphantly through a contest that cost our enemies one hundred and ten millions sterling.

It may be said, they contracted a debt that we are now called on to pay. Admitted, and that it is a sacred debt; but the original holders, who have certainly as much claim as any subsequent purchasers, trusted to the old Constitution without this power, and the sixth article of the new Constitution places this debt precisely on the same footing.

ing as it was before, so that there can be no such claim on the original contract.

But it may be further said, that they have made a new contract, since the adoption and on the faith of the new Government. Then let them show under what part of that Constitution, either in letter or spirit, they can expect this mortgage, this irrepealable tax, in their favor.

Having thus examined the letter, let us advert to the spirit.

Every free Constitution made for the use of man, infers that the various necessities and unforeseen events which characterize human affairs forbid the irrepealable quality of laws. By our Constitution, and that of every Government that really contemplates the rights of freemen, the grant and distribution of taxes, or the public contributions, is confined to the Representatives of the people. When I speak of the Representatives of the people, I do not speak according to the new fashioned doctrines of the day, that the Executive and Senate are Representatives of the people; they only represent the people in my idea, whom the people themselves deputize to represent them. If persons elected by the people elect others, they are not the Representatives of the people; they may be Representatives of the Representatives of the people, which is a very different thing in form and effect. The power of laying taxes, the burden of which must fall on the great mass of the industrious poor, who feel every deduction from the fruits of their labor as a diminution of the sources of life, should rest with those immediate Representatives, over whom these persons have a constant control, to whom they are responsible and whom they may frequently remove. But if one weak or corrupt set of Representatives could, by an imprudent or wicked act, transfer all the attainable resources of society in such a manner that a future set of Representatives could have no power over them without the concurrence of the Executive and Senate, then all this principle of the Constitution is utterly evaded.

But it may be said, that exigencies of State will arise—wars may happen, when it will not be possible to raise the necessary supplies within the year. What is to be inferred from this? Only that we must anticipate, not borrow. This power is certainly given to the new Government, and was to the old it is not denied; but it has been explained. Is it intended that we cannot borrow without pledging particular resources or laying irrepealable taxes? Surely no; because we have certainly borrowed without, still do it, and all nations do it; and unless this can be proved, no right can be inferred; for a right not expressly given, is only to be inferred from necessity. If it should be said that we cannot borrow on such good terms, this quits the ground of right, and dwindles into a question of expediency and convenience, on which I shall observe; but, for the present, it is to be remarked, that exigencies and wars may happen hereafter, and at all times as well as now, and at any other time: and on these principles, will be found as sound arguments for the right of repeal and revocation as of anticipation.

H. or R.]

The Public Debt.

Funding Systems and anticipations have endeared public debts to all Administrations, because they get into their hands and disposition (and make them account when you can) all the attainable resources of society, without the necessity of frequently applying to the Representatives of the People, who have usually accompanied their supplies to Government with an inquiry into its errors, and a rectification of its abuses, which are sometimes very inconvenient things to Administrations. The right has, I believe, ever been defended on this principle: it has been urged that a nation is a body politic and corporate, and never dies; and has, therefore, a right to contract and bind itself by its contracts. The principle, although not founded in analogy, may be true in a degree, and merits examination. Society, by law, may dispose of wealth to individuals upon specified terms, and create fictitious personages and powers with specified rights. This is a modification of the creature of society, by the creative hand of the Constitution; but we should be unsupported by any principle, if we were to apply these qualities to the Constitution, which is the creator; and which acknowledges no superior but God, the natural law which he imprinted in the mind of man, and the power of the people who made it, and by express compact, defined its qualities, powers, and attributes; from neither of which sources, can we derive the qualities thus contended for; but even to admit the analogy, every society, I believe, that has created this legal fiction of a corporate body, have found, by experience, that the usufructuaries are so unmindful of those that are to come after them, that they have generally, if not universally, limited their alienations and mortgages of their revenues to the space of twenty-one years; after which, the obligation of the contract ceases.

In fine, should we admit, which is really a questionable point, that a majority of society, or the present generation of adult age, (capable of contracting) could, by themselves, personally, or by their Representatives, constitutionally, bind themselves by contract and mortgage their industry, so that a future assemblage of the same persons, or their Representatives, could not rightfully avoid the obligation, but would remain bound; yet, as it is a slender and equivocal right, it should at least be exercised with some regard to decency and respect to such future assemblage.

For a Government, at its commencement, to contract debts greatly beyond its immediate resources, to dispose of almost the whole of the attainable revenue in a manner to create, by assuming debts from Governments who were sinking them fast, and were altogether opposed to such assumption, and thus opening a door for the revival of liquidated claims, and make it the interest of States to make out as large a debt as possible, to get a greater share of the general plunder, is certainly covering the weakness of the right by the boldness of the exercise. And then to say to the such future assemblage, "that they shall not pay when they are able," is subjecting them to conditions that none but a lunatic in private life would submit to, and this in direct violation of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the express power of paying the debts of the United States. Can this power of Congress be abridged or destroyed by any contract with a creditor? Such a principle could never bind; it would not be upheld in a private case; it was arbitrary in adoption, shameful in continuance, and would be criminal, perhaps, in imitation.

But, should we admit that a majority of the present generation may so bind themselves and mortgage their own industry, yet, the extent of this power is to be defined. The grand and important question yet remains to be discussed—a question that never has been, and perhaps never will be, fairly met.—Can they sell or mortgage the labor and industry of another generation—of posterity? Are they the judges of the extent and conditions? That they cannot, and are not, is as demonstrable as any proposition in Euclid.

The God of Nature has given the earth to the living. That He will make our children and our children's children as free as He made us, is what no parent, I trust, will deny. Under the Divine impression, the voice of United America has declared that we cannot deprive posterity of their natural rights, which, from generation to generation, must continue the same as we came into the world with; we have a right to the fruits of our own industry—they to theirs.

The infringements of this sacred law, I believe, more often arise from a want of accuracy and precision of reflection, than a desertion of moral principle.

Were all men born on one day, and died on another, the separate rights of posterity would then be as distinctly visible as the line that would divide the one generation from another; but, although the human race flows like a constant stream, in an uninterrupted course of renewal and decay, the rights of the separate parts are the same in reality as if they could be readily and easily distinguished in practice.

That there is a period at which the majority of adults capable of contracting, now living, will give place to a majority of adults equally capable, of the succeeding generation, is as certain as the great principle of mortality itself. This period may be ascertained with sufficient precision for every practical purpose, by the recorded bills of mortality; they are admitted in municipal legislation, and constitute its leading and distinguishing traits. By the calculations of Mr. Buffon, it does not extend beyond nineteen years; but, to give the present the ultimatum of their pretensions over the future, would not carry it beyond twenty years—the period limited by the English law; after which, even a private debt ceases to exist.

And surely these bounds, which nature has established, afforded ample scope for any reasonable anticipations. Can we figure any exigencies of State that ought or can require, from their termination, an anticipation of the resources of Government for a greater length than twenty years? or, that a mortgage of the labor of society should be sold by any contract irrevocable for a greater term? Go beyond this, and you seize on the rights of posterity; pass this bound—there is none other that nature or reason can assign—the great mass of the industry and labor of all future generations becomes then yours to the extent, and on what conditions, you please to prescribe: no other line can be drawn.

Such a principle is against the laws of God and man; it inverts the whole order of society; it sweeps away, in a torrent, every check and safeguard of Government, and arms any Despot, any Administration, with means not sanctioned by nature, to bind in chains their fellow-men.

In the first place, it destroys that great principle which alone was the cause of the war with Great Britain; which cost us the blood of our heroic countrymen, and which involved us in the debt. That taxation and representation should go hand in hand. We have no one quality of the Representatives of posterity—not elected by them, and not responsible to them. It establishes a principle that those are to spend who are to pay. This lets loose extravagance, in defiance of justice, from its only natural restraints. Posterity, whom we injure, has no power over us; we are not responsible to them; the order of nature renders the grave an asylum from their vengeance. It destroys one great check of free legislation—that the legislator should feel, in his own property, the burden of the tax he lays, and the contract he makes for society. It avoids that still greater check, that the constituents should feel the burdens their Representatives impose. The people never act but from feelings: so long, therefore, as their deputies contract for and at the expense of posterity, they act in perfect safety. If they have a right to say they will only pay part of the debt, they may diminish that part at pleasure, and finally they may say they will pay no part; and this, which, in the hyperbole, is precisely, in practice, the very principle we have adopted with respect to the deferred stock; and that not sparingly, as it is almost half our debt. Let any man examine the principles of this novelty of finance, and see where it leads to.

Administration, on this ground, would be perfectly safe in assuming the debt of Great Britain. The honor, if I may use the term, of this bold violation of natural law was reserved for us. The extravagance of veteran corruption in old, exhausted nations, has never, that I have heard, hazarded this principle. It appears as a frontispiece to adorn the annals of an infant Republic. And who will impeach? The people see nothing. The beings whose rights we thus trample on, will not burst into existence until we retire from the scene. Exercising such powers with rapidity, and to the extent already effected—any Administration might become masters of a mass of corruption; and constant, attracting hardly observation, go on to bribe the present with the means of future generations, to do any thing that gold can tempt the weak, the wicked, and the necessitous to do. All Constitutions, all forms of Government, disappear before such a system of finance.

And what is the defence that ingenious and independent sophistry has yet invented? That as posterity are to partake of the benefit, they should pay part of the price. We have gone a little further with our deferred stock: of that we pay nothing, but make them pay the whole; but is it not natural justice that they who are to pay should have some hand in the bargain? Have they not a natural right to judge whether it is a benefit? and whether it is worth the money? Does any man suppose, that a Government that admits such principles will be really a benefit to posterity, or so considered by them?

The case has, indeed, been likened to that of an individual in society, who leaves an estate to an heir, burdened with debts; but it can bear no analogy. Society may say to an individual, by its laws, that we will prevent the intrusion of any other occupant into the property you hold, provided you leave it to your son, or to your creditor. This property the individual had no right to but by law: it is a right which society has secured to him, to the labor of others, which, by nature, he could not pretend to. But different generations of men bear no relation to each other but by the natural law and the terms of the constitution they adopt, and even this last is limited by the former. But in what society upon earth has a contract of an individual ever been upheld, by the municipal tribunals, by which a parent has burdened property with a debt bearing no immediate interest, but to be paid by posterity, or by a contract prohibiting his posterity from paying it off when they are able. I must doubt whether any courts would countenance such principles.

If one generation has a right to sell the produce of the soil for any extent of years, the next generation must quit it. If a nation was to borrow foreigners to such extent, which is not only possible, but, I believe, was nearly the case in Louis the XIVth's time, they must break or quit.

But no principle has ever been admitted with respect to an individual, much less an American parent, that he has a right to dispose of the labor of his child. The child may relinquish the property, and then he has his hands free as nature made them, to labor for himself; so there is no injury to natural right. But where one generation sells the industry of another, they cannot get free unless they go into voluntary exile; and even then, by some modern doctrine, the contract will bind, let them go where they will, whilst they continue in the social bond; they must disperse, like the Jews, to get rid of it.

The iniquity of the principle will be more clear and striking, when we contemplate that all public revenue or private income is a contribution, mediate or immediate, of the labor of the industrious farmer or mechanic. If the rich pay anything, it is only mediate—a part of what they first received from these classes. They are the drones of society, which, however essential to its well-being, are fed by the bees. Money is a representation of industry—a representation of that residuum of labor which the poor either can or must spare after sustaining life. If they only worked to maintain themselves, money would have no value;

there could be no public revenue or private income. It follows, then, that any transfers of public resources to any persons, citizens or foreigners, is a transfer of such a portion of the labor of the farmer and mechanic, and their posterity. No money-lender would lend one farthing, to be paid out of the labor of the rich, to all eternity. It is true that the rich are, by such transfers, diminished in their comforts and conveniences, by withdrawing from them, and giving to others, that part of the labor of the industrious and productive classes, which they before enjoyed under contracts and the laws of society; but they are no objects to the money-lender. It is true, that all public burdens fall, in a great measure, on the land, so as to diminish its value and price, as I shall observe; but then, to the men who lend to Government, lands have no value but from the hands that are to work it.

That country is happy and free, in proportion as its political institutions and public economy leaves to the industrious the greater portion of the fruits of their industry. On the contrary, that country is wretched, and its people slaves, whatever they may be called, whose labor and industry, by any mechanism or movement of society, belongs to others. As this evil proceeds, such country must decline; and, when arrived at a certain extent, it must be deserted.

Contemplate a public debt as a mortgage on industry and labor; extend its effects to posterity; exempt ourselves from the burden, and put it wholly on them, on the principle of the deferred stock, and then say that they shall not free themselves by payment, and what does it amount to? That a free man, born now, has a right to the labor of a free man born twenty or thirty years hence; and that, because he will be then dead and gone, and cannot enjoy it, he may sell it now to a third person, and spend the money. Thus truly simplified, is any American prepared to avow the principle?

So much for the right. I now beg leave to remark with respect to the policy.

From reasons stated, it would be readily imagined what experience has sanctioned—that a Funding System, once begun in any nation, has always increased—the motives that led them to run in debt act with double force to prevent their getting out. It is a cancer in the body politic that acquires strength from amputation; if any remedy exists in nature, it is yet to be discovered. It is so pleasant to spend at other people's cost, that it arms all the powerful passions against the judgment. Hence the rapid accumulation of public debts throughout Europe—the increase exhibits the appearance of the regular ascent of a mountain, while the reductions appear like gullies in the sides, scarcely discernible, impeding the progress but for a moment. Great Britain has run in debt two hundred and fifty millions sterling in less than a century. Had she originally adopted a plan of rendering the debt irredeemable, and had not seized every favorable rise of credit to lower the interest, by which means she pays now three per cent. for money borrowed at eight, no system of taxation would have paid the interest and supported Government even at this day; and all this debt must have begun in the memory of men now living.

That this Government would have funded, in less than five years from its origin, near fifty millions of dollars, and would now propose to fund near twenty millions more—that we should have ransacked the whole United States to find debts to effect this, invite them from every quarter, and set them to find out, create, and revive debts already sunk, to secure as large a share of the general revenue as possible:—that we should have carried the principle to the extravagant excess we have done, by the invention of deferred stock, which no nation ever ventured to hazard, all in our earliest infancy, must afford sublime prospects of our progress in mature age.

Something unexampled must be done; for, if we adopt the addition now proposed, I believe we shall find ourselves saddled with a greater funded debt than Great Britain herself, comparatively with the relative wealth of the respective nations; and I believe their debts make even the boldest veteran of the projecting tribe quake with terror. It is true, we may not feel it so sensibly in consequence of paying no immediate interest in so great a proportion as the deferred stock; yet it is a debt our children will feel, and some of us.

It will in the aggregate form a mass of seventy millions of dollars. The property of the United States is worth what it will sell for at an ordinary market. Although it cannot be precisely ascertained what the amount would be, we are still furnished with sufficient data to form a tolerable estimate. In the State I have the honor to represent, industry and economy have long given a high relative value to their property. That property was assessed, soon after the war was raised, to an ideal height, to twelve millions their money. From the fall of price, I do not believe that the whole or any proportion of it would now bring, at fair market, the money. From this we must deduct four millions for the negro property, which cannot be included in a relative comparison with other countries, when the laborers, although equally and more valuable, are not considered as property; and there would then remain eight millions. Maryland is at least one-twelfth of the United States; she has, indeed, always been rated at a higher proportion; this would fix the property of the United States at two hundred and sixty millions of dollars; the debt, then, is more than one-fourth of the whole value of the property.

The wealth of Great Britain is estimated, by Mr. Young and Mr. Pulteney, and I believe there is no good reason to question their authority, at one thousand millions sterling; they owe two hundred and fifty millions, which is a fourth; their debt, then, is relatively less than ours. Again, from their extensive and lucrative Colonial establishments in the East and West Indies, their annual income is increased so as to yield a net revenue of one hundred millions sterling per annum, so that they really do not owe three years income. What our annual net income is, I have no satisfactory document to form any estimate of, but I fear it is but small. The deferred stock may defer the extent of the evil, but it is by a sacrifice of all principle to convenience.

And for what has all this magic building been erected? What were the benefits expected? The States were going on rapidly in extinguishing their debts; there was no complaint that their certificates were too low in 1785 and 1786. The Maryland certificates were nearly as high as they are now, or would be if assumed. Perhaps some sound understandings were led away by vigor of genius, uncorrected by experience, and became bewildered by the visionary dreams of Pinto, Champion, and a variety of calculators. To compare the Secretary's first Report on the Public Debt with the last on the Frontier Defence, furnishes at least the consolation that a candid mind will relinquish error. Had he adhered to those apostles of political truth, Montesquieu and Smith, the first pages of the first Report would have been stricken out.

It has answered, I will venture to assert, but one good effect of those predicted, for the myriads of evils it has entailed. It has enabled many debtors to pay off on better terms. But the number of them are but few; distressed people cannot keep these things; they early get into other hands.

As to its increasing our capital, that ground is now abandoned even by bigotry itself. To mortgage an estate adds nothing to its value—an estate is not doubled by dividing its profits. So much less wealth as is borrowed on property, of so much less value is the property to him that holds, pays the interest, and stands charged.

Every atom of funded debt is so much taken from the value of the land in the hand of the landholders, and so much diminished from the value of labor to the laborer. Thus one great blessing of the funded debt predicted, the rise of land, has taken a contrary direction; unless it is round some towns, lands will hardly sell at all. Even in England and the old countries, where there is a variety of other wealth, the public debt has so far lessened the value of land, that an estate that actually produces £90,000 a year, is in fact only estimated at about £63,000, and when sold the year's purchases are estimated at the latter sum.

Men that purchase land are not so thoughtless of posterity as administrators usually are. They purchase in a great measure for children. They consider the incumbrances, and fix their price accordingly. Although we pay no interest on deferred stock, yet it enters deeply into the price of our lands.

There is another consideration that is weighty on this subject. That stock in every country, particularly in one situated as we are, is ever varying in value. Since I have been here, in five weeks, it has altered its value one-third. It cannot serve them as a medium of commerce, for that must be some certain common standard. To measure our commodities by a standard more variable than the commodities themselves, has always been held as absurd. Consequently, I never heard of land, or indeed any thing else, sold for stock. If the exchange takes place at all, it is first by a sale, and money is the medium. It bears, therefore, such a proportion to the money in circulation, and requires so much, that it pinches all other objects of sale, land, produce, and I believe commerce too. It is an old maxim, and I believe a true one, that if money is to be had, it will be had to game with. Stocks are so uncertain, that traffic in them has ever been considered as a species of gaming. Their value is supported by it. Withdraw the gamblers, and the whole fabric vanishes. They are the leaven that raises the bread of the stockholders. The misfortune is, it is so extensive as to withdraw men from the solid pursuits and moderate profits of useful occupation into a vortex of corruption and vice. This is a complaint from all quarters, and so very general, that I must believe it has too much foundation.

This kind of gaming has ever been considered as highly pernicious to the public morals. If it is so, no benefits (if such exist) could compensate the injury. To a Republic, whose existence depends on a due proportion of disinterested virtue, such an over-dose of poison administered must either destroy the patient, or be thrown off by some violent and latent power of the Constitution.

A love and veneration of equality is the vital principle of free Governments. It dies when the general wealth is thrown into a few hands. The effect of stocks is to transfer the fruits of the labor of the many, who are able to appreciate its value by the difficulty of acquirement, and would convert it into useful improvement, into the hands of the opulent few, who exchange them for foreign luxuries, and consume in an hour the labor of industrious families for years. It prevents a general diffusion of wealth by drawing it to a centre, and saps the foundation of a Republican Government, especially in a large Continent.

In a young country, these effects of individual opulence are particularly hurtful. Such men are not only idle themselves, but they maintain numerous idle dependants and menial servants, whose lives are consumed in ministering to their luxuries, and whose services die the moment they are rendered. Their want is felt in an unimproved, thinly populated country, where there are no superfluous hands, differently from an old well settled State, where there are more hands than employment. But of all opulence, that of the wealthy stockholder is most fatal to a young country. Where a man's revenue arises from landed property, it is created by productive labor employed on the land, and the necessities of life are increased as his income increases. As his wealth depends on the value of some particular estate, it becomes his interest to improve it. His private advantage becomes the public prosperity. He also who employs his capital in manufactures, increases thereby the aggregate of necessary productions; and even he who lends money on interest to individuals, generally selects the industrious from motives of safety, and so increases the general welfare.

But wealthy stockholders who have lent their money to Government, are interested in no particular spot of land or manufacture. They improve nothing, but take something from all. They are citizens of the world; oftener foreigners than natives; attached to no country. At the first appearance of danger, they sell out, and sink your credit at the moment it becomes essential. As your distresses increase, they fly you. When the impending cloud of misfortune casts its gloom beyond you, these sunshine friends disappear in a moment.

So far as foreigners are proprietors in our funds, the inquiry into the operation is truly interesting to the independence and prosperity of the community. In peace you are tributary, in war you are at their mercy. Great Britain and Holland, allied as they are with their interest in our funds, present an object that must be viewed with concern. How far our pecuniary interest is benefited is also truly consequential. I have been, some time ago, told that they possessed eleven millions of the thirty-one, and from the proportion of purchase made since it was supposed they owned at least one-half. A great deal of money ought to have come in for this. Is this the fact, or have we taken in exchange their gewgaws and luxuries, and eaten up the fat of our land? I fear the fact is so. Had their purchases been made with money, there must have been a demand for money here, and exchange would have fallen. It is an invariable rule, to try the flux and reflux of money. It has almost always been, I believe, considerably above par, except one year when there was a demand for produce; then it fell at once fifteen per cent. below par. Money certainly came then, and I believe one year's good price for produce of more real advantage than any stock that could be devised, or any price that could be wished for it.

But this mode of employing money has reduced produce to nothing. It takes considerable capital to make the expensive and circuitous voyages necessary to vend our produce, and the profits can never be large; for the difference between the price of the necessities of life, and raw materials in different countries, will not bear high commission or charges of transportation.

Thus I have considered all the boasted benefits of Funding Systems but one, and that is the strengthening of Government. That, to a certain extent, they may have this effect, may be true; but, carried beyond it, they certainly operate in a contrary direction. Let the interest settle chiefly in the hands of foreigners, or let the agricultural interest, which in a young country must always preponderate, become alarmed at its extent, and jealous of a moneyed interest acting in opposition to their wishes and principles, and it may destroy a Government that otherwise might have secured the public happiness; but these are trifling circumstances. The position may be justly reduced to this: A good Government will always be supported without these aids by the good sense of a great majority of its members, and a bad one ought not to be supported by it. Now the mischief is, that these people support bad Government more willingly than good, because they are better paid for it; they can make better bargains with them. There is a still further consideration that will affect this country powerfully, and is peculiar to it. Our people will not purchase to hold at the prices stocks have risen to. Foreigners have the market to themselves, and they must finally settle with them; this prevents their lending money to us in peace, on the terms we obtained when under the pressure of every calamity, and had no right to expect the establishment of our independency. They purchase into our funds instead of lending; this is the effect of the irredeemable quality of the stock; it deprives us of every benefit of the rise of credit, and gives the market to foreigners. The strange terms on which it is constituted, must keep its value always unsettled, as the redemption is rendered so contingent; this also deprives it of every useful quality as a medium of intercourse, and must keep it an object of barter.

What would be our operation but for this irredeemable quality? Why, as our credit rose at market, we would do as Great Britain has done—form new loans at a lower interest, and pay off the debt at the higher interest; this is done without a sinking fund on hand, and shows the folly of those that say we cannot redeem now as fast as we have the liberty. In Great Britain, soon after the establishment of their Funding System, they effected new loans, and in 1717 reduced the eight and six per cents, to five; and in 1727, they reduced the five to four; and from 1750 to 1757, they reduced the four to three; which was equal to the sinking half their debt: and from the first creating of their three, to 1757, they averaged at market, par, that is, were equal to gold and silver. By these operations, there was no injury to the creditor in reality, for he could, at the end, sell the £100 that bore three per cent. for as much money as he lent Government at eight. At this moment, if it were not for the irredeemable quality, we could, if our credit is worth four per cent. as we are told, make an operation that would be equal to the sinking of our debt nearly one-half in value, on the same plan that Great Britain has pursued so successfully. And the public creditors are really not benefited by this irredeemable quality; for, although it raises the price of sixes with foreigners, yet it keeps down that of threes; which, by a reduction such as I mention, and the liberation of our commerce from high duties, must soon be on equal terms to what they were in Great Britain in the infancy of their Funding System, that is, near par.

In fine, the debt is to be deplored, but it must be paid; let as much of it be paid, and as fast, as possible; these are the true principles of public credit. Let us reprobate the idea of increasing or continuing it when it can be avoided, upon the principles of any political enterprise. It seems strange to be called upon to fund it now, and provide the funds hereafter. It looks too much like taking an undue advantage of a future Legislature, and has a suspicious, and low, lurking aspect, when we know that we are really not the true Representatives of the people. Are we afraid that a real representation of the people would act otherwise? If we are, we ought to hesitate. All the virtue of this Continent is certainly not confined to this session; we may trust that any succeeding Representative will be as just and wise as ourselves. As they are to find the means of paying, let them agree on the terms of the contract.

Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, said: The ill policy of any assumption of the State debts has been asserted, and, in my opinion, very satisfactorily proved, in the discussion which this subject has already undergone.

Taking it for granted, for the present, that an assumption, in some form, must take place, I rise to offer my sentiments in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. The measure, as contemplated by the Secretary of the Treasury, is, as I have observed, impolitic, as it will greatly increase the public burden, already too great, for the resources of which the United States, in this infant state of their Government, can avail themselves; but it is also unequal, and as it respects several of the States, very unjust, as it saddles them with the debts of other States. Because they have exerted themselves successfully in effecting the extinguishment of the debts which they contracted in the common defence, they are now to be loaded with the debts of those States which have made no such exertions.

If any gentleman will take the trouble of examining the first assumption, and will add to it what is proposed now to be assumed, he will find that the sums so assumed from the respective States are not such as would have resulted from a due apportionment of the whole sum assumed, among the several States in the Union, according to their respective numbers.

To vindicate an assumption so unequal and disproportionate, gentlemen must prove to us that the payments which the several States have actually made towards the general defence, have been in exact proportion to their ability, that is, according to their numbers. They must satisfy us that South Carolina, though she had, previous to any undischarged, had nevertheless discharged as great a portion of debt incurred in the war as any other State in the Union; and that the reason why she had then so great a State debt pressing heavy upon her, was not because she had not exerted herself according to her utmost ability to discharge that debt, but because she had contracted a debt much beyond her just proportion; that is, in fact, that, upon a final settlement of accounts, she would have a balance due equal to the sum which constitutes the difference between her just proportion of the whole sum assumed, and the sum actually assumed; which is, in this case, more than four millions of dollars.

The same reasoning would apply to the other States who have sums assumed beyond their just proportion. Upon these principles, too, they must prove to us that New Hampshire, upon a final settlement of accounts, would be found in debt to the Union more than seven hundred thousand dollars; that is, that she is the greatest delinquent in the Union. I ask gentlemen if they have any documents to prove this.

It would be easy to satisfy an inhabitant of Massachusetts or South Carolina that they were great creditors, and that New Hampshire is a very great debtor. But it will require something more than the confident assertions of gentlemen to convince the State I represent that this is really the case; they believe, and they will continue in this well-founded belief, till some evidence appears to the contrary, that they at least contributed their just proportion towards the general defence. Some States, no doubt, from the manner in which they were peculiarly circumstanced, may have done more than in proportion to New Hampshire, while I am persuaded that others have done less. The United States have uniformly proceeded upon the idea that the States who have done more than their proportion should have credit in a general settlement, while those who have done less, should be compelled to pay the balances due from them. I have no doubt but that some of the States, who now have debts unassumed, will be found entitled to balances, but I deny that New Hampshire can justly be called upon for the payment of them.

Congress have uniformly taken it for granted that the inequalities which may have existed in the exertions of the several States, can only be remedied by a settlement of all accounts between the United States and the several States. At great expense, they have established Boards of Commissioners, with very ample powers; they have sent commissioners into the several States, to receive and adjust their claims. The States have been at very great expense in stating their accounts, and procuring the necessary vouchers to support them. But gentlemen have now made a discovery, which, if it had been made in season, would have saved all this trouble and expense; they have discovered that the several States in the Union have laid equal burdens on their citizens to carry on the war and to discharge the debt incurred in the common defence, and that equal justice required at the commencement of this new Government, in 1789, that the United States should step in between the States and their creditors, and ease them of their debts. But the gentlemen who have made this discovery are too much interested to expect full credit to their sentiments on this head.

It happens, somewhat unfortunately for this hypothesis, that those who maintain it are those who are to be gainers by it. It may well be expected that less evidence will satisfy South Carolina that she is a creditor State, than New Hampshire that she is a debtor; and more efficacious logic must be used to induce the latter to pay seven or eight hundred thousand dollars of the debt of the former, than to persuade the former to put that burden off her own shoulders and lay it upon the latter. Let not gentlemen imagine that New Hampshire, though she is a small State and of no great importance in the Union, patiently submitted to the injustice of the former assumption. They remonstrated: that remonstrance is now on your table. Why did they complain? Because, in that assumption, they were considered as the greatest debtor of any State in the Union; and because they were, as a constituent part of the Union, called upon to pay seven or eight hundred thousand dollars of the debt of South Carolina, Massachusetts, or some other State. Why should it be taken for granted, they ask, that we are a debtor? What documents are gentlemen possessed of that justify such a supposition? Let them be produced. If the opinion of gentlemen who have spoken within these walls and without, is to be relied upon, there is scarce a State in the Union but that has done far more than her proportion; so that there must be a great balance due to each State. All this tends to show, that it is unreasonable to expect that any one State will patiently submit to a measure which takes that for granted which they do not believe, and which it is never their interest to admit. There never was, in my opinion, but one principle which could justify any assumption previous to a final settlement, and that was, giving relief to States who had unquestionably contracted a debt much beyond their just proportion, and who were groaning beneath the burden of that debt. Where it could be known with tolerable certainty that a balance would be finally due to such a State, much might be said in favor of anticipating the payment of it. But was this the principle which governed? Was this principle at all pursued? Were $2,200,000 assumed from Pennsylvania, because she was or would be a creditor State, or because she was heavily burdened with debt? Will gentlemen undertake to say that any principle at all was adhered to in the assumption? Was it not a mere bargain and sale between certain States who were interested, that an assumption should take place; and who, provided they could be only exonerated from their own debt, would not stick at any means to accomplish so desirable a thing? Was it not at the expense of justice, and at the expense of certain States, particularly at the expense of the State I represent? If the States who had the largest portion of debt to struggle with, at the adoption of the present Constitution, were to be relieved, such relief might have been afforded without any violation of the principles of justice and equality. The United States might have afforded a temporary relief, till the accounts were settled; or, if it was thought best to assume the balances due from those States to their creditors, a proportionate sum—which is what I now advocate—should have been assumed from every other State. The United States could never advance a sum to any one State without advancing a proportionate one to every other State, without at the same time declaring that the one had better pretensions to such a grant than the other. And what can authorize such a declaration? I know of no data on which to found it. A gentleman from Massachusetts objects to this; he says this would greatly increase the public debt, and he appears now to be a great enemy to such an increase. When this argument was urged against any assumption, it was treated with great contempt. It seems, however, that gentlemen have no objection to increasing the public debt, as far as the debts of their respective States will do it. They do not wish to go further. They are against accumulating the public debt, if they are not to have the whole benefit of it. If they are in favor of an assumption, they should be in favor of an equal one. Some gentlemen have taken much pains to convince us that the citizens of their States are zealous for the measure. I am not disposed to doubt it; if they can have their burdens taken from their own shoulders, and placed upon their neighbors', it is not to be expected that they should complain. But because the winners are pleased too. But we are told that the losers are pleased too. But we are told that the inequalities of both assumptions will be remedied by the settlement. Who, is it expected, will be deceived by this State device? Is there any one so ignorant? What is it but saying, submit to injustice now, and we will redress it hereafter. Only be so kind as to acknowledge now that you are a debtor State, and we will be much obliged to you; and if it should turn out, on settlement of accounts, that you have been paying our debts for us, we will then repay you. But do not these same persons tell us, that the accounts never will be paid or received. I believe it. I consider this assumption as signing the death-warrant of the settlement of accounts. Therefore, let the assumption be equal. If any take place at this time, I hope it will be a just and equal one; nay, more, that it will redress the inequalities of the former one; and that the States who have laid heavy burdens on their citizens, will not be punished for their laudable zeal in extinguishing their debts, but that they will at least fare as well as those who have made no such exertions. In one word, I am against any assumption; but if any assumption obtain, as it cannot be known which State is debtor or which creditor, let the sums assumed from each be equal, that is, according to their respective numbers.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he was not in the situation just complained of, the Representative of a State, the whole of whose debt had been before assumed, and therefore interested in opposing any further assumption. He was from a State, the half of whose debt was not before assumed, and they were not consoled by observing, that four-fifths was assumed for their next neighbor, neither was it a solitary instance of treatment, such as had not been expected from that House. He did not indulge the habit of complaining; but he felt it to be his duty to remember them, and the people from which he came could not easily forget them. He was however of opinion that these evils would not be corrected by a general assumption, on principles so ungovernable as were contained in the proposition now under consideration, and that it would administer injury rather than relief.

Each State had been made debtor for the sum assumed, and as the General Board of Commissioners for settling all accounts between the United States and individual States, had reported that the whole would be finished in little more than a year from this time, he was of opinion it would give much more effectual relief to the States which had been injured in the apportionment of the former assumption, and upon principles much less injurious than the general and promiscuous assumption, which would be the effect of the present proposition.

As the subject was not now before the House, his opinion upon it in general had been often expressed. Events had much confirmed his former opinions on the subject, and he was more than ever convinced of its pernicious effects. This Government, said he, is not calculated to bear a heavy burden, it is put to its worst use when it is put to that use, it shows the Government to the greatest disadvantage. The general national powers, the want of which was so much complained of before the institution of it, appear, from the experiment, to be more easy and manageable than was expected. When considered as a great society, instituted by Sovereigns to cut off the causes of war among themselves, and to deliberate on general national concerns which could be not otherwise provided for—it is an experiment honorable to human nature, and is as useful an extent of the social principle as the institution of society over individuals for the supply of their wants, and to prevent individual slaughter and carnage. Its friends have had great reason to promise themselves success to the experiment, if there can be a due moderation in administering it, in confining it to those objects for which it was alone intended. But, if any one supposes that this Government may be made to answer the purposes, and be put to the same uses as common Governments, and be administered upon the same principles, it gives reason to believe that he is either wicked in his intentions, or that his mind has never comprehended the subject. General questions of boundary, of war, and peace, regulations of commerce, a moderate and general impost for the immediate support of the Government, might be decided in a manner that would reflect honor on the Government, and to the satisfaction of the people. But accumulate an enormous public debt, and let this Government be called to the odious task of applying to the individual citizens for a heavy tax, and you will then see the structure of the Government to the greatest possible disadvantage. It is better suited to any thing than that. It ought to be directed to such a use with the most extreme and cautious reluctance. Probably it will be found, in the nature of things, impossible that it should be well adjusted to such use. To raise a heavy tax, there ought to be a great similarity in the circumstances of the persons on whom it is to operate. If the burden is not equal, it must be in some parts cruelly oppressive. The first object, in attempting a heavy tax is, to be sure that it will be equal; otherwise, some will be crowded to their destruction, while others are exulting in prosperity, and feel no burden at all. There is such a dissimilarity in the interests and circumstances of the extensive country over which this Government is to operate, that it will be scarcely possible to adjust heavy burdens to any tolerable equality. The whole current of experience in society forbids the expectation. Even some of the States had found their limits too large to preserve the necessary equality in their own revenue systems. And to suppose that this Government should be able to bear burdens in the same proportion to its size, without intolerable oppression, is founded neither in good sense nor experience.

This view of the subject supposes the most honest disposition in endeavoring to make the burdens as equal as possible. But an important view of it, which ought to be taken on this occasion, is, that there is much less security for an honesty of disposition in laying the burdens. The circumstances of the persons who make the laws, and of those on whom they operate, ought to be closely connected, and thoroughly in the view of each other. The moment they get so far dissociated as not to be known and felt by each other, security against oppression is gone. In this Government there can be but a mere shadow of representation. In many instances, not more than one for a hundred miles square. They for a great part of the year are entirely detached from their constituents, so that they who are acquainted with their circumstances at home, cannot be intimately acquainted with their conduct, so as to judge of the motives by which they are governed. And they who are witnesses of their conduct in the Government, do not know their circumstances at home; so that men may feel themselves at greater liberty to indulge improper passions, than they would if both their circumstances and their conduct were under the immediate notice of their constituents, and thus the motives by which they were governed on every occasion could be easily explained. On the general national subjects, which are their more immediate province, there would be less danger from this cause, as they would present fewer objects for individual passions. But, in the collection and management of vast revenues and their necessary concomitants, there are the strongest lures to improper conduct. The love of power and property are two fierce passions of nature, which if they can be indulged without any loss of reputation, or even without the fear of detection, will be sure, in all countries, to make havoc of the happiness and rights of men. He did not pretend that it was possible altogether to avoid this source of danger. The Government cannot be carried on without resources; they had been provided to a pretty large extent on its first commencement, by general regulations, which appeared to have been tolerably satisfactory to the community.

They who agreed with him in the general observations which he had made, must allow that they were substantial reasons against the proposition on the table, and that those debts ought to be left upon the States, rather than be assumed by the present Government.

Mr. B. said, the general assumption, not only reconciled very ill to the nature of the Government, as he had shown, but it also reconciled as ill to the circumstances of the country. It was, in its very nature, designed to draw off business and property from the different States, and unite them in one great vortex at the centre. This is an evil which appears to have been most cautiously guarded against in every part of the Constitution. How many checks and guards show themselves in every part, to keep up the equality of States, to prevent the combination of strong interests in giving special advantages, and that there should be no preference for the increase of the ports of one State over those of another. No one can look over the principles of the Union without seeing this to be the great and striking feature of the whole States possessing equal powers, feeling and being strongly attached to their own advantages, and, like individuals in forming a society, giving them up with reluctance, and only such as appeared indispensable to the protection of the rest.

The present object seems to be to construct a huge, gigantic organization at the centre, which shall collect all the vital fluids, to strengthen and enlarge those parts, without any means of propelling a circulation in return to keep up the principles of life in the extremes of the body. The very figure is monstrous. A State centre and a State organization, which it is the avowed intention of the present system to reduce, and as far as possible to do away, is necessary to preserve the principles of life in them. The collection of a revenue in the States, and the circulation of it among their people, is not only necessary to their health, but it is necessary to their existence; and they who avow their opposition to it are seeking their destruction. The instance which had been mentioned of a distant State paying more than half a million of dollars in a year, which had been sent on to the General Treasury, without scarcely any call on the Government to receive any part of it in return, struck him very forcibly and the more forcibly, as the same impression had been made upon him from his own State. One of their ports, he said, would probably this year pay into the Treasury forty thousand dollars; and, except the accidental circumstance of there being at this time some companies of the Federal troops in that State, who might receive their pay there, he knew no cause which could have prevented the actual sending of almost the whole of that sum in specie to this place; which, if it were to take place every year, and increased in the manner as is now proposed, would soon drain them of all the medium by which business is to be transacted.

The circulating medium in society has been aptly styled the oil of the machine which lubricates all its motions. Adopt a system which shall entirely prevent the supply of it, and the motions cannot be easy; when the solid parts are left to grind against each other, it is not to be expected that the machine should long remain cool.

Mr. B. proceeded to take a view of the subject on the grounds which the gentlemen in favor of the proposition had themselves taken, that the general assumption must intend either taking up all the debts of the States, whatever may have been the cause for which they were contracted, or there must be some process to distinguish those that were contracted for the purpose of carrying on the war.

He could not suppose that any person could be serious in maintaining that all the debts of the States, contracted for the support of their Governors, or State Legislatures, or for any other State purposes, ought to be assumed by the United States. It had been the universal principle, from the first contracting of the debts, that a distinction ought to be made between what was contracted for the purpose of carrying on the war and what was not. He then reviewed the systems of the old Congress on that subject, and showed how they had at the time assumed the claims of the States as the expenses were incurred, and passed particular resolutions for their liquidation, putting them on interest upon the general funds, which was then called funding them.

Congress was continually extending their assumption by particular resolutions, founded on the nature of each particular case, and, by the agency of Commissioners invested with chancery powers, to enter most summarily into all the equitable considerations attending the particular applications. For several years after the close of the war, till they supposed they had assumed nearly all that ought to be assumed, some few cases they had left undetermined, as the Penobscot expedition, &c. That there might not be left the least color for any complaint on the part of the States that Congress was reluctant in assuming any debts which had been contracted for carrying on the war, in the year 1786 they appointed a General Board of Commissioners, with ample powers to assume all debts which might be still remaining, which, upon the principles of equity and conscience, they might think ought to be assumed. It will be seen by the Journal that this passed unanimously, and appeared to give universal satisfaction, carrying the principle as far as it ought to be carried. The whole of this process has been founded on the universal impression that a distinction ought to be made between the debts incurred for the purposes of carrying on the war and debts contracted merely for State purposes.

There has been immense labor for these ten or twelve years past, at an expense not much short of a million of dollars, in liquidating and distinguishing the proper debt of the United States. The House had been officially informed that the business was now near a close, and that the whole would be finished in a short time. Can any one, he asked, after all this, be hardly enough to intend that the United States should be plunged under the promiscuous debts of the States, regardless of all distinction?

He was sensible that the proposition under debate professed to regard the principle, and contained a proviso, that no State certificates should be assumed which on the face of them appeared to have been issued for any other purpose than carrying on the war. But it was in vain that it contained the principle, if it was accompanied with no mode of carrying it into effect. From that cause, he supposed, there was some reason to suspect the sincerity of the intention. He believed there could not be devised a mode for carrying the principle into effect more summary and complete than that which was now in operation, and so near its close, under the General Board of Commissioners. They had power and evidence to distinguish the proper debts; they would strike the balance in favor of the States who were actually in advance, and then no one could object to assuming it.

He was thus particular on this part, because some gentlemen had taken the liberty to place it, in some respects, in an unfair view. The former assumption had not been contended for as necessary to the final attainment of justice. There was no doubt of a complete attainment of justice on striking the balance of the accounts under the system which has been described. But some of the States complained of the present pressure of their enormous debts, and, in confidence of a large balance appearing in their favor, begged a part payment in advance, to be received on account, for their immediate relief. On these grounds only had the former assumption taken place. It was presumed that enough was left in arrears to secure an adherence to an impartial settlement, which might correct any mistakes in such a random assumption. In this view the argument which produced the former assumption loses all its force on the present occasion. It will be difficult to conceive that the little fraction of debt left on the States is a burden so much more enormous than the whole war that it cannot be supported a few months till there is a settlement of the accounts. If the assumption should, in any instance, be made to exceed the amount of the claims, it will be productive of great discontent and embarrassment; when it approaches near the balance of the claim it is foregoing the security for the final settlement of accounts. As this general settlement of the accounts had been continually regarded during the whole of the war, as the minds of the citizens had been reconciled to quotas and requisitions made on very slight information, merely by being led to expect justice from that event, and as it was the basis on which alone our proceedings since could be explained, he thought there should be some care not to make it the interest of any to wish that it should be relinquished.

Mr. FINDLEY said, during the progress of the discussion in support of the resolution, it has been presumed by all the gentlemen on that side of the question, that the irredeemable principle ingrafted on the Funding System, was an equivalent for deferring one-third of the debt for ten years. In short that it was equal to the original contract; consequently, that the Funding System, including the irredeemable quality, was a full discharge of the original obligations, and that the amendment now under debate, if adopted, would be a breach of the original contract, and would operate unjustly towards the public creditors.

In all transactions in public life wherein I have been engaged, and the public creditors concerned, I have steadily attended to their honest claims, and supported their interests, agreeably to the principles of the Government. In this I have acted with the same industry and zeal that I have exercised in contributing to accomplish the Revolution, from which these claims originated. I have been attentive to the present Funding System, in its progress to existence, and in its operation and effects; and I did, and still do, believe that the irredeemable principle was no equivalent for the departure from the original contract. I am also persuaded, that it is inconsistent with the original contract, and contrary to the principles of the Constitution, and unsuitable to our political circumstances. With respect to the first, I know of no law existing in any of the States, whereby a debt which the creditor can only recover at a distant period, and in very small instalments, is rendered more valuable than a right to recover it on demand, and all at one time. Disposing of property, to be paid for in instalments, and at a distant period, is common in this country; but in that case, the privilege is supposed to be enjoyed by the debtor, for which he always pays a higher price. To presume that putting a man's just claims to prompt payment out of his own power, except in such small portions and distant periods as he cannot reasonably calculate upon receiving in the course of one generation, nor to such an amount at any one time as can be applied to any valuable purchase, is presuming contrary to reason, to the laws and usages of the United States.

But it may be answered, that the public creditors, as a party in the contract, had a right to agree to such terms, if they pleased; and that they did agree to them, is, by their acceptance in subscribing to the loan, testified. It is not pretended that the terms were proposed by the public creditors; so far from this, it is well known that many of them remonstrated against the terms of the Funding System, and gave an ample testimony against the irredeemable quality being an equivalent for deferring; or, in other words, lowering the interest of the debt.

Their acceptance of the terms is no proof of their voluntary approbation; it was not optional to them on impartial ground. Provision was made for the interest for fifteen years, and the obligation made perpetual in favor of those who subscribed; and, if I am not mistaken, the provision was afterwards made perpetual; and what was the alternative in favor of those who did not accept? Why, they had a provision of four per cent. made for one year only, without any obligation for continuing that provision, and without interest upon their interest, as those who subscribe have; and so recent and striking an instance before them of disregard to the original obligation, both in matter and form, as is witnessed in the Funding law, was a discouraging circumstance to those who would have otherwise preferred resting their claim upon that ground. In this situation, interest and necessity dictated the propriety of accepting the terms of the Funding System, not as an equivalent for their claims, but as the best they could get. That the original holders accepted with reluctance, and remonstrated, we know: that many of that description, as well as foreigners, did not accept at all, is evident from the question before us. The parties, therefore, were too unequal for a contest, and the terms were too unequal, with respect to security, to render the acceptance a proof of approbation. The truth is, that the irredeemable quality appears never to have been intended as a real or solid equivalent. It was wholly calculated to be a subject of speculation, which might draw the attention of persons in those countries where, from the superabundance of specie capital, enormous national debts, and long habits in stock-jobbing speculation, is become a science. To promote this, which was unnatural and novel distinction of parts, which had no foundation in the contract, and a variety of necessary fluctuation in the comparative value was introduced. This distinction to the merit was well adapted to be an inducement to the meritorious public creditors, especially such of them as resided in the country, to part with their certificates.

The two-thirds of two-thirds, the six per cents, the three per cents, deferred debt, &c., all in one certificate, which the farmer received, originally with an obligation simply of six per cent upon the principal, until it was paid, is so much beyond his comprehension, that he prefers parting with it to keeping it on terms which he does not understand, and which he conceives may, with equal ease, be changed again by the same authority into other and more unintelligible varieties. To this end, it corresponded to admiration. Few, indeed, are the certificates now in the hands of original holders of the agricultural class.

One leading advantage which the promoters of the Funding System suggested that would arise from its operation, was a circulation of the revenues to the more remote parts of the country, in payment of interest, which had been previously drawn into the Treasury by duties, and had the system been adapted to the genius and circumstances of the people of the United States, this no doubt would have been its effect, and in this way a beneficial balance of circulating specie would have been supported. It was also suggested, that the certificates when appreciated, would assume the form and use of a circulating medium, and in this way be as a substitute for money, promote the purchasing of land, improving the country, and give a general spring to industry; and this salutary effect a Funding System, calculated and guarded suitably for that purpose, might also have had. But these important consequences have been completely defeated by the irredeemability and other peculiarities of the Funding System; that the Funding System was calculated to be a field for speculation, was the general opinion of people of reflection, when it was originated. And what has been the effects of its operation? Why, it has introduced the most extravagant combinations, promoted fictitious credits, and by giving a facility to stock-jobbing, in all its varied forms, has become an enormous and ruinous snare. It has occasioned many of the most enterprising characters to desert the useful paths of industry; dissipation, gambling, extravagant projects and extravagant modes of life, are promoted to such a degree, as to be ruinous to our morals and degrading to our national character. Wealth hastily gotten, without industry, has changed the grades of society, and erected a new and formidable interest in the Commonwealth. One week we behold fortunes rising like exhalations, and the price of stocks blown up above all reasonable calculation; but perhaps before the next week arrives, we find the stocks fallen a fourth or a fifth, and disappointment, bankruptcy, and stagnation of the most useful branches of commerce, spreading consternation far and wide, and the tales of villany and consequent distress swell up the news of the day. Though I have not changed my opinion of the Funding System, since it made its appearance, yet I confess its delusory and ensnaring progress has been more rapid, the bubbles have sprung up and burst in greater variety and in quicker succession than I expected. General confidence and contentment among the citizens has not been among the effects produced by the irredeemability, and the complex and mysterious forms of the Funding System.

A principal advantage the Funding System was to produce, was, the lowering the rate of interest for money; indeed this was the principle upon which it was supposed to be calculated; it was to reduce the rate of interest to five or even four per cent. by its beneficial operation as a circulating medium, &c. I ask, sir, has it had this effect? No, it has not, but the reverse. I acknowledge certificates have been purchased at a rate that would not afford five per cent. upon the price given for them, and that even after they were above par; but at the same time the rate of negotiable interest rose to an unheard of height. No such instance of usury was heard of in this country at any former period, (except in the times of general distress and bankruptcy occasioned by old debts, losses in the course of the war, and an over-importation of goods at the conclusion of the war) and this has not been incidental, but the native effect of the system. Negotiable interest has risen too high for the solid purposes of commerce, and capital, and attention have been withdrawn from it by the bubbles of the times; and by the prevailing fluctuations in the funds and private credit, the regular circulation of credit and cash suited to commercial purposes are obstructed. However, I do not deny but that importations are too great for the public good, but this is not the result of the quantity, or high price of our exports, but it is the return for our certificates transferred to foreigners, to whom they are in the more esteem because of that irredeemable quality to which I object. In consequence of this, we become tributaries to foreigners, over whom we have no control, and from whose wealth we can derive no advantage. This evil has already prevailed to a great degree, and by the present system can neither be remedied nor prevented.

I have said that the Funding System is inconsistent with the original contract. This is evident from all its complex and mysterious division of parts and difference of value, which had no foundation in the original obligation. Many instances of this might be adduced, but I will only select one. The act of Congress provided for the redemption of the old Continental bills of credit at forty for one; the Funding System provides for it at the rate of one dollar for the hundred, and that dollar subject to its divisions of parts and value. Is not this a total departure from the contract, both in matter and form? It is vain to answer, that the Congress money had been considered as lost, and had depreciated much lower than one for forty. The sanction of an act of Congress, supported by the obligation of the Constitution, fixed it at forty for one; and the same power that could alter it to one hundred for one, could annihilate that or any original claim altogether. I am not here treating about the equity of the claims, but about the Legislative authority of Congress to change contracts which they were bound to fulfil, both by the acts of the old Congress and an express clause of the Constitution.

In preparing and enacting the Funding law, Congress seems to have laid aside the character of the Legislature, and assumed that of the Judge; whereas, their most conspicuous character in transacting that business ought to have been that of a party prevailing for the payment of their debts; but, in acting the part of a Judge, they have taken it upon an original plan. They have changed the value and the principles of the claim by a mere act of their will, without being guided by reasons taken from the original obligations; but have rather been influenced by the contemplation of the mighty political machine they were about to erect, viz: an unextinguishable national debt and consolidated moneyed interest.

I have also said, that the irredeemable quality of the Funding System is contrary to the Constitution. Congress have the power of applying the public resources towards paying the debts of the Union. Every successive Congress is equally vested with that power. It is derived immediately from the Constitution to every Congress, and not derived through the laws of one Congress to another; but, in the Funding System, the Congress who enacted it have decreed that no succeeding Congress shall pay the existing debts of the United States, except in certain small and distinct instalments, which, perhaps, would occupy two, or a part of three, generations to complete. Certainly the present Congress cannot say unto the next, or to any future Congress, that they shall not do what the Constitution expressly says they have power to do; and yet, if we reject the amendment and adopt the resolution, we are in fact saying so. If we do so, we are holding out a further delusion to the citizens. Snares of this kind have proceeded far enough already. A future Congress certainly will disregard this restraint, and repeal the irredeemable quality of the Funding System.

The creditors who hold those claims for which we are about to provide, have an unquestionable right to six per cent. interest upon the original claim—not to interest upon the interest—but to a provision for extinguishing the arrears of interest. All the different laws which I know of contemplate a delay of payment of interest and expressly guard against paying compound interest. The party to whom interest is due may claim and recover it at short periods, but if it is not claimed, or cannot be got, any supposed delay does not enable the creditor to claim interest thereon. This proves that legal interest is supposed in the law to be a sufficient compensation for the delay of payment.

My first design was to have moved to amend the resolution so as to provide six per cent. for the principal, according to contract, and to have proposed some provision for paying the arrears of interest; but, upon reflection, I find the business so far put out of its natural course already, that I have relinquished that design. The progress of innovation has been so great that it is difficult to tread back the ground; therefore, I will vote for the amendment.

One difficulty which influenced me to give up my first design was, that not only the arrears of interest which arose since the first of January, 1788, is funded at three per cent., to those who subscribed to the loan, but also the indents of interest issued previous to that period, under the Confederation, which had been disposed of and provided for by requisitions as fully as the power or laws of that Government permitted. Many, indeed I believe most of the States, had made adequate provision for them to their respective citizens; and those who did not, were under the same obligations to do it that they had been to do any other part of Federal duty in the course of the Revolution. Even these have been received again and funded at three per cent. The indents, and about three years' interest, which became due since the first of January, 1788, making, in all above ten millions, have been funded. Above seven millions of these, if it was not a debt created by the Funding System, received a resurrection by it. This will explain the charge of creating a new debt, asserted by one of the gentlemen, and denied by another. Here was above seven millions as redeemed, which ought to have been considered, as such as were not citizens of any State, and above three millions funded at three per cent., for the doing of which there existed no obligation. If it be answered, that equity required it, I will allege that, if the Congress, acting on the general claims of equity which originated in the course of the Revolution, a much greater amount must yet be provided for. I never knew a public creditor who expected interest upon his interest, or that expected the indent debt that had been disposed of to be received, or otherwise provided for than by a final settlement between the respective States and the United States. Why should they expect Congress to make provision where an actual obligation did not exist, when, in the same act, they were destroying ten years' interest of one-third of the principal, where the most express obligation did exist, and where the claim was also founded in the strictest equity? This increase of the debt, and funding at three per cent., appears not to have been calculated for the profit, nor at the request of the public creditor; for what they gain in the one hand they lose in the other. Nor does it operate as a gain to the United States. If we may judge of its object by its effects, we may observe that, by receiving the indents redeemed by the States, an increase of revenue becomes ne-

No ships on our stocks, few vessels in our harbors, commerce decayed; the vital spirit lost. I might say more; but I will turn from a disagreeable scene to one more pleasing.

What is our present state? The credit of our Government is as good as that of any country. Individuals of all nations will trust the individuals of America. Individuals here (until a late unfortunate bubble or abuse of credit, arising from bad men or bad management, and which will possibly only do hurt for the moment) gave full credit to each other as far as their capital extended, as well in the city as in the country, and confidence prevailed. Agriculture, where the people are industrious and apply their attention to the raising of those articles which are most in demand, is in the highest improvement ever known here before. I can speak with confidence of the State I live in. The idle and indolent can expect no great success in an art which depends upon the steady hand of industry. There are ships on the stocks in every part where there are ship-builders and materials. The tonnage list will evidence the mighty increase of the American shipping; it has far exceeded the most sanguine expectation. Several of the first merchants state your commerce in a most respectable situation, far beyond any other period. Indeed, the returns from the Secretary of the Treasury show how great our imports and how vast our exports. In point of justice, our reputation stands high with the world; our courts will do justice. Pray what foundation for those strong assertions which have been made against the Constitution and the Government?

As to the Funding System, I shall say little at present. I much doubt if it deserves the hard names which have been given it. Abuses will be committed in all countries; no human plan can be secure against them. The assumption of the State debts was fully considered upon a former occasion. Several of us wished to fund the debt of the Union alone; many gentlemen of the South, when we came to look for ways and means, voted against us, and the Eastern Representatives were always ready to join in defeating us, unless the assumption of State debts also took place.

The bill passed the House of Representatives for funding the debt of the Union alone; but the Senate sent it back, with an amendment, assuming State debts to a certain amount. After much argument, the amendment of the Senate was agreed to by the House of Representatives. Justice was nearly done to some States; others do complain, and I think Rhode Island with much reason.

I could have wished that the accounts between the United States and the several States had been settled. But I will give the gentlemen who complain so much an opportunity of satisfying this House, (if they are able,) when the blanks are to be filled up in the bill, that the sums they demand are reasonable, and are intended to give relief to the people of their States. I will vote for the resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY, in answer, said: If I am not altogether so elated with our present prosperity and resources as my worthy colleague, who has just sat down, I assure you I am not desponding. I think our resources are competent, and our circumstances not depressed; the great industry of our citizens, and the great demand and high price for our produce in foreign markets, which took place about two years ago, gave a spring to our wealth and industry, and furnished ample resources to Government; our feelings have not been pierced with the cries of general distress, until very lately, through the abuse of the novel principles introduced in the Funding System. But though I rejoice with the gentleman in the sufficiency of our means, yet I consider ourselves in the situation of an unexperienced heir, newly come to the enjoyment of a great estate, who, being dazzled with his own splendor, and confident of his means, sets about spending without system or principles, and gets embarrassed before he is aware. We are told, that the principle of assuming the State debts is already admitted by the last Congress, therefore it ought to be completed now; we are just told, too, that it was fully considered there. I ask, then, why was not the business fully completed at that time? If it was not, then what good reason can be given for carrying it further now? Is there any new discovery of better rules to apportion by? or is the distress of the States who have yet some unassumed debt, as pressing as when they had to bear the burden of three or four millions more than now? Gentlemen know, that the length this business has gone already, has given great uneasiness to those States who made the greatest exertions to extinguish their own debts, and to whose circumstances and feelings the resources applied to the assumed debts of the States, are distressing and disagreeable. For what purpose are the Commissioners employed in adjusting the accounts between the individual States and the United States, if the whole of the State debts were to be assumed previous to that settlement? We know the Government is not vested with powers to compel delinquent States to do justice, and that if ever justice is done to those States who have extinguished their own debt, it must be by increasing of the general revenue in proportion to the money Congress will have to pay to those States; and it is an unjustifiable and dangerous policy to draw the money from the people with one hand, to pay it to the State Governments with the other.

I have such information as I can depend upon, that the Commissioners will report upon the final settlement of the State debts, in the course of next winter; and the resolution before the Committee makes no provision for interest until after the year 1792. Why then take this further leap in the dark, when those States who will be actually entitled to it, will be as soon relieved, according to the principles of justice, as they would be by distributing the public property in this manner, by the rule of thumb?

I always thought the assumption of the State debts a measure which the Constitution did not contemplate, and which had a tendency to sow the seeds of discontent in many parts of the Unit-cessary, and the States become like pensioners to Congress for the annual amount they are to receive. Thus the revenue must be the greater in the hands of those who conduct it, and the individuals of the States must be dependent on the Treasury of the United States for the means of their support. Foreigners may make reprisals if they are not paid; for does the support of their Government depend upon it. But this is not the case with dependent States. We know several of the States are in this way entitled to a greater annuity than is necessary for the support of their Governments, and the people are in the habit of living wholly free of State taxes; while, to accomplish this strange state of things, the debt of the Union is increased, obnoxious revenues are rendered necessary, ministerial influence, speculation, and consequent depravity, are advanced.

With respect to the dangerous effects which the irredeemable principle and unnecessary increase of funded capital will have upon the genius of our Government, and the interests of posterity, this subject has been investigated with too much ability by the gentlemen who were up before me in support of the amendment, that I will not now detain the Committee with any thoughts upon it, but will conclude with observing that, having proved that the irredeemable principle, which the amendment is designed to correct, is not an equivalent for the departure from the terms of the contract, and that, being contrary to the Constitution, cannot be obligatory on any future Congress, but is delusory in its nature, and calculated to promote speculation and a transfer of the debt to foreigners; and that the increase of funded debt created in the Funding System was not necessary from the original obligation, nor profitable to the public creditors, but calculated for dangerous speculating and political purposes. I will sit down, with expressing a wish that, by adopting the amendment, we will prevent the worst effects of the Funding System from being further extended. The Committee now rose, and reported progress.

SATURDAY, March 31.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to provide for the Territory Northwest of the River Ohio," which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. VINING, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to compensate the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the occupation of, and damages done to, the said school, during the late war; which was received, read twice, and committed.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Whereas, by several documents and papers communicated in pursuance of a resolve of the Legislature of Maryland, it appears that Nicholas Moxton Moore received, from the Treasurer of that State, on the 24th day of November last, the sum of two hundred and forty-two pounds eight shillings and three pence, current money of the said State, the amount of a judgment rendered against him in the General Court of the same State, on account of horses purchased for the use of the United States, during the late war; and that the claim of the said State, by the payment aforesaid, hath not been credited in the accounts of the same with the United States:

"Resolved, That the proper officers of the Treasury be authorized, and they are hereby directed, to adjust and settle the said claim with the Agent of the State, and any limitation in the acts of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to Mr. SENEY, Mr. GENNY, and Mr. SUMNER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A representation and memorial of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was presented to the House and read, praying that the General Government will assume the balance of the debt of the said State. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt.

Mr. GENNY offered a few remarks on the subject, and urged the justice and sound policy of completing a business which had, for reasons well known, been left in an unfinished state, but which equity and precedent now called on Congress to finish.

Mr. CLARK was opposed to the proposition.

Mr. HARTLEY.—After so long a discussion, my attempting to take up any great length of time would not be excusable; but I consider it my duty to say a word or two in answer to some expressions and observations used against the Constitution and operation of this Government; and give a few reasons why I shall now vote for the resolution under consideration. It will not be necessary to take into view the principles upon which the Constitution was framed; they were fully examined in the General Convention, and stood the test of the strictest scrutiny. They are favorable to liberty and justice. As to the operation of the Government, we may best understand it by contrasting the state of America at the adoption of the Constitution, with that of the present day. At the former period, our credit as United States of America was at a low ebb. Few of the individuals of foreign countries would give credit to the individuals of this. The capital of Europe would not be trusted in America; they doubted our justice as well as our Government; there was scarcely any credit given to individuals here; a universal distrust prevailed. Agriculture languished; the farmer diffident, he had lost his confidence; the great spur to industry was wanting.

ed States; and now it is argued that the precedent being set by the last Congress, we ought to copy it. I admit of no principles of infallibility in Congress: and if precedents produce an obligation, we ought to be the more careful not to strengthen them, by repeating such as are improper or doubtful. The only plausible reason for assuming the State debts in the last Congress was so far, was to ease the burden of such States as had been most backward in providing for their respective debts, so as that they might be able to provide for what remained until the accounts would be settled, and to make some provision for the States who had done much to extinguish their debt, as a security that the debts would be brought to a final settlement. Certainly these States, at whose desire and for whose convenience so much has been done, ought to have a little more moderation.

Mr. Madison observed, that a great deal had been said to prove that the General Government is under obligation to provide for the debts of the individual States. The gentlemen who maintain this opinion have not shown that the creditors themselves ever entertained an idea that they should look to the United States for payment of those debts. It is not pretended that the new Constitution varies the situation of the creditors; they stand precisely on the same ground they did under the old Confederation. He (Mr. M.) denied that in the former assumption, the creditors of the individual States were considered in the same point of light as the creditors of the Continent, and for the truth of this, he appealed to the law itself "making provision for the public debt."

The proposition now before the Committee he considered as unjust, as it would place some of the States which had made no exertions to discharge its debts, in a more eligible situation than those which had made the greatest exertions to effect that object. He denied that the first assumption had been generally approved, or had been acquiesced in, and adverted to the proceedings and resolutions of the State of Virginia on the subject; papers are on the table to show the truth of what is now asserted: he added that he was sorry to find that no more attention had been paid to those papers. Mr. M. then noticed the state of imports and exports from the several States, to show the unequal operation of the assumption as it affects those States, particularly Virginia, which pays so great an over-proportion of the interest on the debts of some of the States.

Mr. Gerry stated a variety of instances to show that the debts of the individual States were always considered as founded ultimately on the faith of the Union; that the creditors had taken the paper of the States on that idea; that the States were considered as agents for the United States: and, on this principle, the contracts for supplies and services on a Continental account had been made, without which the war must have ceased, and the subjugation of the United States have followed. Mr. G. remarked on the partiality and evident injustice of leaving the possessors of the remainder of the State debts totally unprovided for.

The question on agreeing to this proposition was carried in the affirmative, 33 to 25, but was eventually lost.

The Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, April 2.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing Returns of Duties arising on Imports and Tonnage within the United States, for a year, ending the 30th of September; also, a Return of Exports within the same period. Whereupon, Ordered, That the abstract returns of duties on imports and tonnage, also the abstract of exports from the United States to foreign countries, be printed for the use of the members of this House; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, in the course of this session, the quantity and value of the exports from each State, anything in the order of the 10th of November last to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon, as follow:

"Resolved, That the term for receiving on loan that part of the domestic debt of the United States which yet remains unsubscribed, be extended to the first day of — next, on the same terms as was provided by the act making provision for the public debt of the United States.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made for payment of the interest on the unsubscribed part of the domestic debt of the United States, to the first day of —, one thousand seven hundred and ninety—, on like terms as was provided by the act aforesaid.

"Resolved, That the term for receiving on loan that part of the debt of the individual States assumed by the United States, yet unsubscribed, be extended to the first day of — next, on the same terms as is provided by the act making provision for the public debt.

"Resolved, That a subscription for a farther loan in the debts of the individual States be opened and continued to the first day of — next, not to exceed in the whole — millions of dollars, in the proportions following: that is to say, [Here enumerating the several States.] Provided, That the interest on such loan shall not be payable before the — day of —. And provided, That when the sum to be assumed for any State shall not be subscribed by the holders of any of the evidences in which the same is made receivable, the State shall not be entitled to receive interest on the residue.

"Resolved, That the subscriptions to the aforesaid loans in State debt, be payable in such certificates, bills, notes, and evidences of debt whatsoever, as shall have been issued by the respective States, and by the several Commissioners of Loans of the United States, on account of the excesses of the sums subscribed in certain States beyond the sums heretofore assumed for such States: Provided, That no such certificates, bills, notes, or evidences of debts of the respective States, shall be receivable upon the said loan, which, from the tenor thereof, from any public record, act, or document, shall appear or can be ascertained to have been issued for purposes irrelative to compensations and expenditures for services or supplies towards the prosecution of the late war, and the defence of the United States, or of some part thereof during the same; but this shall not be construed to exclude any certificate, bill, note, or evidence of debt, which shall have been issued in lieu or on account of any other certificate, bill, note, or evidence of debt, which was itself issued in relation to such compensations and expenditures.

"Resolved, That the debt due to certain foreign officers, the interest whereon is payable at the house of Grand, in Paris, be discharged out of any moneys obtained on loan by the President of the United States, in virtue of the act making provision for the public debt, which may now be unappropriated.

"Resolved, That the interest on so much of the domestic debt as has been or may be purchased for the United States, or as shall be paid into the Treasury, and so much of the sum appropriated for the payment of the interest on the foreign and domestic debt as shall be over and above what may be sufficient for the payment of such interest, shall be appropriated for the redemption of the public debt. The said funds to be applied to the purposes aforesaid by the Commissioners hereafter mentioned, under the approbation of the President of the United States.

"Resolved, That — be Commissioners for the purposes aforesaid, and that a precise account of all the debts redeemed, and of all purchases by them made, be laid before the Legislature within — months after its first meeting in every year."

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions; and the first resolution being twice read, a motion was made, and the question being put, to amend the same by adding thereto the following words:

"Except that condition in the act which renders the debt so far subscribed subject to redemption by payments not exceeding, in one year, on account of both principal and interest, a proportion of eight dollars upon the hundred, on any certificate which shall be issued according to the terms therein specified: which condition, so far as it relates to any part of the debt which may hereafter be subscribed, shall be abolished."

It passed in the negative—yeas 27, nays 30, as follows:

Frederick Aug. Muhlenberg, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, John Steele, Samuel Streett, Jonathan Sturges, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and Artemas Ward.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said first resolution, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The second and third resolutions were then severally read; and on the question thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said resolutions be postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, April 3.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Illinois and Wash Land Companies, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying lists of sundry petitions returned to this House, pursuant to an order of the 27th of last month; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole House yesterday, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt. Whereupon, the fourth resolution having been read, in the words following:

"Resolved, That a subscription for a further loan in the debts of the individual States be opened and continued until the first day of — next, not to exceed in the whole — millions of dollars, in the proportions following: that is to say, in the debt of New Hampshire, —; [and enumerating all the other States.] Provided, That the interest on such loan shall not be payable before the — day of —. And provided, That, when the sum to be assumed for any State shall not be subscribed by the holders of the evidences in which the same is made receivable, the State shall not be entitled to receive interest on the residue."

A motion was made, and the question being put to amend the same by inserting after the words "individual States," these words: "whether discharged by the said States respectively since the treaty of peace, or undischarged."

It passed in the negative—yeas 22, nays 30, as follows:

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said resolutions be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, April 4.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole House on Monday last, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the Public Debt. Whereupon, the fifth resolution having been read, in the words following:

"Resolved, That the subscriptions to the aforesaid loans in State debt be payable in such certificates, bills, notes, and evidences of debt, whatsoever, as shall have been issued by the respective States and by the several Commissioners of Loans of the United States, on account of the excesses of the sums subscribed in certain States beyond the sums heretofore assumed for such States: Provided, That no such certificates, bills, notes, or evidences of debt, of the respective States, shall be receivable upon the said loan, which, from the tenor thereof, or from any public record, act, or document, shall appear or can be ascertained to have been issued for purposes irrelative to compensations and expenditures, for services or supplies towards the prosecution of the late war and the defence of the United States, or of some part thereof during the same; but this shall not be construed to exclude any certificate, bill, note, or evidence of debt, which shall have been issued in lieu or on account of any other certificate, bill, note, or evidence of debt, which was itself issued in relation to such compensations and expenditures."

The question was put that the House do agree to the same, and it passed in the negative.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions were severally twice read; and on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the first, second, fourth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. KEY, Mr. MACON, and Mr.

Sumner, of South Carolina, do prepare and bring in the same.

On a motion made and seconded, "That it be an instruction to the committee last appointed, to report a provision for a loan of the remaining debts of the individual States:"

The said motion was objected to, as out of order. Whereupon, the SPEAKER declared the said motion not to be in order; from which decision of the Chair, an appeal being made by two members to the judgment of the House, and the question taken, "Is the said motion in order?" it passed in the negative; and so the said motion was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to ascertain the boundary of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion, Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper officers to lay before this House such papers of a public nature, in the Executive Department, as may be necessary to the investigation of the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GILES, and Mr. STEELE, be appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States with the foregoing resolution.

GENERAL NATHANIEL GREENE.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the 24th of February last, to indemnify the estate of the late General Nathaniel Greene for a certain suretyship entered into by the said Nathaniel Greene, in his lifetime, on the public behalf. Whereupon, the said resolution being read at the Clerk's table, as follows:

"Whereas, the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, on the 8th day of April, 1783, the more effectually to procure rations and supplies for the Southern Army of the United States, became bound as surety for John Banks & Co. to Newcomen & Collet, merchants in Charleston, for the payment of £8,743 15s. 6d., sterling money, being the condition of the said bond:

"And whereas, on the 1st of May, 1786, the balance of principal and interest of said bond, being then £8,688 6s. sterling, was paid by the said General Greene. Therefore,

"Resolved, That the United States shall indemnify the estate of the said General Greene for the said sum last mentioned, and the interest thereof, or for such sum as, upon due investigation by the officers of the Treasury of the transactions between John Banks & Co., with Messrs. Newcomen & Collet, in which General Greene was security for the said Banks & Co., it shall appear that neither General Greene nor his executors shall have received any payment or compensation for:

Provided, The executors of the said General Greene shall account for a sum being about £2,000, be the same more or less, recovered by John Ferrie, one of the partners of the said John Banks & Co., to be in part of the indemnification aforesaid; and also shall make over for the use of the United States, all mortgages, bonds, covenants, or other counter-securities whatsoever, now due, which were obtained by the said General Greene, in his lifetime, from the said Banks & Co., on account of his being surety for them as aforesaid, to be used for the name of the said executors, for the use of the United States."

The previous question thereon was called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said resolution, be now put?" And on the previous question, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative. And then the main question, "That the House do agree to the said resolution?" being put, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 26, as follows:

NAY.—John Baptist Ashe, Elias Boudinot, John Brown, Abraham Clark, William B. Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. BARNWELL, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt." The said bill was read the first time.

Mr. SENY, from the committee to whom was referred a motion relative to a certain claim of the State of Maryland, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to compensate the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the occupation of, and damages done to, the said school during the late war; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, and providing compensation for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill authorizing a grant and conveyance of certain lands to the Ohio Company of Associates, on the terms therein expressed; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, April 5.

An engrossed bill to compensate the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the occupation of, and damages done to, the said school, during the late war, was read the third time and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt" was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene for a certain bond entered into by him, for the public service, during the late war; which was received, and read the first time.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Secretary of War on the memorial of Anthony Walton White, which was made on the 21st day of February, 1791. Whereupon, so much of the said report being read as proposes—

"That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, paper currency, advanced by the memorialist for the support of his regiment of cavalry, during the late war, should be passed to the credit of the memorialist, at its specie value, on the final settlement of his public accounts, either with the State of Virginia or the United States."

Ordered, That the same be referred to Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. MOORE, and Mr. SUMPTER, with instruction to report thereon by way of bill or bills.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill authorizing a grant and conveyance of certain lands to the Ohio Company of Associates, on the terms therein expressed; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. MURRAY, HERO reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to ascertain the boundaries of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes;" and the same being read, was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to supplies necessary for the ensuing year; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to a resolution that Congress will adjourn on Tuesday, the 17th of April, instant; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying his report on the subject of compensations to officers employed in the collection of the revenue, pursuant to an order of the 18th of January, 1791; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act fixing the compensations of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress;" and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill, together with the amendments, was then read the third time and passed.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

A message was received from the President of the United States returning to the House the bill passed by the two Houses entitled "An act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the first Enumeration," and presented to the President for his approbation on Monday, the 26th of March; to which bill the President having made objections, the said objections were read, and ordered to be entered at large on the Journal, as follows:

"UNITED STATES, April 5, 1792.

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

"I have maturely considered the act passed by the two Houses entitled 'An act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration;' and I return it to your House, wherein it originated, with the following objections:

"First. The Constitution has prescribed that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; and there is no one proportion or divisor which, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of Representatives proposed by the bill.

"Second. The Constitution has also provided that the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand; which restriction is, by the context, and by fair and obvious construction, to be applied to the separate and respective numbers of the States; and the bill has allotted to eight of the States more than one for every thirty thousand.

"G. WASHINGTON."

Resolved, That to-morrow be assigned for the reconsideration of the said bill, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

FRIDAY, April 6.

An engrossed bill authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to the Ohio Company of Associates, according to the terms therein expressed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States; which was received, and read twice and committed.

INDEMNITY TO GENERAL GREENE.

A bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene for a certain bond entered into by him, for the public service, during the late war, was read the second time; and, on a motion made and seconded that the said bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the first Monday in August next, it passed in the negative—yeas 17, nays 45, as follows:

YEA.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Clark, William B. Giles, William Barry Grove, Aaron Kitchell, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Andrew Moore, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Joshua Seney, Jeremiah Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, and Hugh Williamson.

NAY.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, John Brown, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, Daniel Huger, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, John Laury, John Laurens, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, Samuel Livermore, John Francis Mercer, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, John Page, Josiah Parker, Theodore Sedgwick, Upton Sheridene, Israel Smith, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Peter Sylvester, Geo. Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, John Vining, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, Alexander White, and Francis Willis.

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House proceeded to reconsider the bill passed by the two Houses entitled "An act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration," which was presented for approbation on Monday, the 26th of March, and returned by the President yesterday, with objections.

The said bill was read, and is as follows:

"An Act for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the 3d day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of one hundred and twenty members, elected within the several States, according to the following apportionment, that is to say: Within the State of New Hampshire, five; within the State of Massachusetts, sixteen; within the State of Vermont, three; within the State of Rhode Island, two; within the State of Connecticut, eight; within the State of New York, eleven; within the State of New Jersey, six; within the State of Pennsylvania, fourteen; within the State of Delaware, two within the State of Maryland, nine; within the State of Virginia, twenty-one; within the State of Kentucky, two; within the State of North Carolina, twelve; within the State of South Carolina, seven; and within the State of Georgia, two.

"JONATHAN TRUMBULL,

"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"JOHN ADAMS,

"Vice President U. S. and President of Senate."

The President's objections were also read; and, after debate on the subject-matter of the said bill, the question "That the House, on reconsideration, do agree to pass the bill," was determined in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and passed in the negative—yeas 23, nays 33, as follows:

YEA.—Fisher Ames, Egbert Benson, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, Israel Jacobs, Aaron Kitchell, John W. Kittera, John Laurens, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, John Steele, George Thatcher, Thomas Tredwell, John Vining, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and Artemas Ward.

And so the said bill was rejected, two-thirds of the House not agreeing to pass the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to supplies for the ensuing year; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the first and disagree to the last amendment proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for fixing the compensations of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress."

SATURDAY, April 7.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying sundry petitions which were referred to him, and returned pursuant to an order of the House of the 27th ultimo.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers," was read twice and committed to the whole House immediately.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, reported that the Committee had had the bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said bill, together with the amendment, was read the third time; and the question being put that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative. Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a Light-house on Montauk Point, in the State of New York;" and, after some time spent therein, and an amendment being made thereto, the said bill was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to reconsider their last amendment, to which the Senate hath disagreed, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act fixing the compensations of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress;" and the same being read—

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their said amendment.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills apportioning Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, at the ratio of one Representative for every thirty thousand persons in the respective States; and that Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. SENY, and Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, be the said committee.

The House again resolved into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary relative to supplies necessary for the ensuing year; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported several resolutions thereupon, which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill apportioning Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, at the ratio of one Representative for every — thousand persons in the respective States; which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for altering the times of holding the Circuit Courts in certain districts of the United States, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table.

MONDAY, April 9.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred a motion respecting a claim of the State of Maryland: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the claim of the said State be allowed for the sum of two hundred and forty-two pounds eight shillings and three pence, current money of the said State, paid to Nicholas Ruxton Moore, for the amount of a judgment rendered against him in the General Court of the said State, on account of horses purchased for the use of the United States during the late war; and that the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, be authorized and directed to adjust and settle the said claim, with the agent of the State aforesaid, on the same principles as other claims of the several States are adjusted and settled; any limitation in the acts of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SENEY, Mr. GRAY, and Mr. SUMNER, do prepare and bring in the same.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for an Apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration; at the ratio of one for every — thousand persons, in the respective States.

Mr. GILES observed, that, although this subject has been heretofore thoroughly discussed, and the minds of gentlemen probably fatigued with the discussion, yet he could not help trespassing upon the patience of the Committee, by mentioning some of the principal reasons which would influence his vote against the motion, and in favor of that ratio which will afford the greatest number of Representatives authorized by the Constitution. He was induced to do this from an opinion that, in the usual course of things, arguments will have an effect upon the public mind in some measure proportioned to their own solidity, and the purity of the motives which actuate them. That the compound of these qualities forms a common standard, by which all arguments would and ought to be measured by the great majority of the people; and he had no objections to submitting his reasons to the application of this common standard; he meant, however, to confine himself to general remarks, and not to fatigue the Committee unnecessarily with minute exemplification of them.

He proceeded by observing, that the expression in the Constitution induced and justified the general expectation among the people of the United States, that one Representative for every thirty thousand persons was secured to them by the Constitution; that a definitive certainty in the number of Representatives, as well as the manner of procuring them, is, in its nature, of Constitutional and not of Legislative provision, and affords a reason against varying the ratio mentioned in the Constitution, although that ratio be expressed in terms of latitude; that Congress had confirmed the general expectation in the public mind by the proposed amendments to the Constitution, and had at least given a solemn opinion in favor of the ratio of one to thirty thousand, until the number of Representatives should amount to one hundred, after acquiring which number by that rule only, a qualified discretion is admitted; that the opinions of the great bulk of the people of America were in favor of an increased representation, at least as far as the utmost limits prescribed by the Constitution; that this circumstance was evidenced by the Conventions which adopted the several Legislatures before alluded to; that it was proposed amendments before adopted the proposed amendments evidenced by the number of Representatives in the respective State Legislatures; that this last circumstance is rendered peculiarly forcible by a comparative view of the objects of the legislation chartered to the Government of the United States, and those retained to the State Governments. The objects of legislation chartered to the Government of the United States are wholly national and important; the objects of legislation retained to the State Governments are comparatively local and subaltern: those peculiarly prompt temptation and invite corruption—these offer no inducements to either. In the Government of the United States, the constituents of the Representative body are complex and diversified; in the State Governments they are comparatively simple and assimilated. That a sympathy with the feelings of the people should characterize this branch of the Government; wisdom is the expected characteristic of the Senate; and despatch of the Executive.

To the inequality of representation relatively to States suggested to result from the application of this rule, Mr. G. replied that the inequality complained of is rather ideal than real; that to determine how far this consideration really ought to exist among States, it is right and proper to ascertain the whole comparative Government: and the issue of this inquiry will be, that those States in whose favor the rule is said to operate, possess the least governmental influence in the Senate, proportioned to numbers; and that the casual gain here is no equivalent for the certain loss there. As far, therefore, as the governmental influence of States in relation to numbers is to operate, it will furnish a motive of preference for the rule he contended for.

It has been said (continued Mr. G.) that the representation of the States in the Senate is strictly defined by the Constitution, and that therefore the consideration of the relative influence of the States, then, should not be resorted to as an argument in the apportionment of Representatives to this House. But, it should be observed, that the rule contended for, though not so strictly defined, is equally within the pale of the Constitution; and the most extended use to be made of this consideration is, to manifest the impropriety of resorting to the pretended inequality among States, as a conclusive argument to vary that ratio of representation for this House which is admitted to be the most proper, upon its intrinsic merits, and when viewed without a reference to that consideration. This particular subject suggests a peculiar equity and propriety, in taking into consideration the comparative governmental influence of the States in the Senate, proportioned to numbers; because, it is in consequence of a representation by States, there, that they gain this unequal influence: and nothing more is contended for by this rule than a representation of the people through the medium of the several States, here. The rule of representation is not the cause of the present inequality, as far as it may appear to exist; it is a mere contingent circumstance, depending upon arbitrary facts and numbers, which cannot be rendered subservient to any general rule. It should also be remarked, that most of the States supposed to be favored by the operation of this rule, have, heretofore, been unequally represented in the extreme; and from the extent and rapid population of these States, it may be concluded, with certainty, that previously to the expiration of the present apportionment, the real inequality of representation in this House, as well as in the Senate, will continue to bear particularly hard upon them. Perfect equality is unattainable; and the proposed ratio is, in the principle, equally subject with any other to all the inconveniences which it is intended to remedy.

The inconveniences of the rule he contended for, in their utmost extent, can never be very great, because the same rule is applied in the same manner to the respective States; and the most extended scope for its unequal operation must be confined to the casual result of the fractional numbers within the several States. In reflecting upon this argument of inequality of representation in relation to States, an idea had presented itself to his mind which seemed to him both novel and important; and that is, that a quality exists in the Government, from its peculiar organization, which enables a minority of constituents, through the medium of a majority of Representatives, to give law to a majority of constituents, absolutely against the will of their minority of Representatives. This quality of the Government arises from the State representations in the Senate; and it exists not merely in speculation or idea—it has been sensibly felt in practice, and there is a real tendency in the Government to make it still more so. The very bill now under consideration will probably furnish one strong evidence of its efficacy in practice; it would have passed very differently from the present proposition, if it had not met with this unnatural check; and I am concerned, said he, to remark, that almost in every important measure of the Government, the minority of the people of the Union had given law to the majority of the people, against their consent, as far as this can be evidenced through the medium of their Representatives. This, it is to be feared, is a radical evil in the Government, and its magnitude would be in a great measure proportioned to the extension of the objects of legislation by this Government. If the people be the only legal source of governmental authority, and this right of individuals be equal, this is certainly a heterodox principle in the Government. He would not pretend to say, however, that this was a cancer upon the body politic too inveterate and vital to admit of a cure; but he conceived it to be a sore of that sort which it would be unwise to irritate or tamper with: and he conceived, also, the present proposition not to be without its irritating qualities.

Mr. G. then proceeded to consider, upon general principles, of increasing the representation in this House to the full extent authorized by the Constitution, and particularly with a view to the necessity of establishing, in this branch of the Government, a permanent sympathy with the landed interest. He observed, that all Representative Governments appeared to possess a natural tendency from Republicanism to Monarchy; that, great inequalities in the distribution of wealth among individuals, consequent upon the progress of their Governments, appeared to be the cause of their political evolutions; that no competent remedy against this evil had been heretofore discovered, or at least practically applied by any Government; that perhaps this great political light may first shine forth through the medium of the American Constitutions, and serve, as some others have previously done, to illumine not only the American, but the European world.

The peculiar circumstances of the United States, however, since the late Revolution, and in the infancy of the American Governments, favored extremely this natural principle of the growing inequality in the distribution of wealth amongst individuals. An extensive, unexhausted, fertile country furnished full scope for agriculture, the plenty and cheapness of provisions and rude materials for manufactures, and an unshackled commerce for the merchant; and to these were added the blessings of peace, and laws securing to the individual the exclusive possession of the fruits of his own industry, however abundant. There were intrinsic circumstances; there was a continuation itself and its consequent blessings—had been incurred, and, from the imbecility of the then existing Confederacy, and other causes, was depreciated considerably below its nominal value; but it was then in small masses, and not very unequally spread amongst the individuals throughout the whole United States. The Government of the United States, instead of managing this contingent circumstance with caution, and declaring so in its ministrations, seized upon it with its fiscal arrangements, and applied it as the most powerful machine to stimulate this growing inequality in the distribution of wealth—a principle perhaps too much favored by other existing causes. The Government, not satisfied with the debts contracted by the former Confederacy, assumed the payment of a great proportion of the debts contracted by the respective State Governments, and established funds for paying the interest of the whole. This measure produced two effects, not very desirable amongst individuals. It gathered these scattered debts, at a very inferior price, from the hands of the many, and placed them into the hands of the few; and it stimulates the value of them. Thus collected into greater masses, beyond all calculation, by the artificial application of fiscal mechanism, it produced a variety of serious effects with respect to the Government. In opposition to the agricultural or republican, it enlisted a great moneyed interest in the United States, who, having embarked their fortunes with the Government, would go all lengths with its Administration, whether right or wrong, virtuous or vicious, by rendering the debt but partially redeemable, passing perpetual tax laws, and mortgaging their property to the payment of the interest of this perpetually-existing debt. It gave the Executive a qualified control over the best moneyed resources of the United States, not contemplated by the Constitution, nor founded in wisdom. It gave rise to an unauthorized incorporation of the moneyed interest, and placed it as far as possible from the reach of future Legislative influence. It established the doctrine that one systematic financier was better able to originate money bills and tax the people of the United States, than the whole collected wisdom of their Representatives, with the aid of a reciprocity of feeling. It gave rise to the idea of a Sinking Fund, without limitation as to amount, to be placed in the hands of a few trustees, and there to be protected from Legislative control by all the sanctions and securities annexed to private property. In short, it established the doctrine that all authority could be more safely intrusted to, and better executed by a few, than by many; and, in pursuance of this idea, made more continual drafts of authority from the Representative branch of the Government, and placed it in the hands of the Executive; lessening, by this mechanism of administration, the constitutional influence of the people in the Government, and fundamentally changing its native genius and original principle. He (Mr. G.) knew of no comprehensive remedy against the abominable evils to be apprehended from the future operation of these unhallowed principles, but a permanent establishment of the candid or republican interest in this House; and the best chance of effecting this great object he conceived to be a full representation of the people. His alarms respecting these fashionable, energetic principles were greatly increased by a perspective view of some of the proposed measures of Government. He saw systems introduced to carve out of the common rights of one part of the community privileges, monopolies, exclusive rights, &c., for the benefit of another, with no other view, in his opinion, but to create nurseries of immediate dependants upon the Government, whose interest will always stimulate them to support its measures, however iniquitous and tyrannical, and, indeed, the very emoluments which will compose the price of their attachment to the Government will grow out of a tyrannical violation of the rights of others. He would forbear to mention a variety of other circumstances, to prove that principle having a tendency to change the very nature of the Government, have pervaded even the minutest ramifications of its fiscal arrangements, nor would he dwell upon the undue influence to be apprehended from moneyed foreigners, who had become adventurers in the funds, nor the various avenues opened to facilitate the operation of corruption. He would merely remark, that, acting under impressions produced by these considerations, and strengthened by others not less pertinent and important, suggested by a number of gentlemen, in the course of the discussion of this subject, and believing that a full representation of the people will furnish the only chance of remedy for the existing, and a competent protection against future evils, he should feel himself criminal if by his vote he should give up a single Representative authorized by the Constitution. The same impressions would have induced him to have voted for the proposition which gave one hundred and twenty members, had it not been for a conscientious and paramount regard for the preservation of the Constitution. The difference of the position of the members throughout the United States, which would have been assumed by the difference in the manner of making the apportionment, never amounted to the minimum of a consideration with him against the proposition; for he felt a conviction that the agricultural or equalizing interest was nearly the same throughout all parts of the United States; and he hoped that the increased representation would furnish strong testimonies of the truth of the position. He would remark, generally, the Government of America was now in a state of puberty, that is, at this time. She is to assume a fixed character, and he thought it in some degree rested upon the vote now to be given, whether she would preserve the simplicity, chastity, and purity of her native representation and Republicanism, in which alone the true dignity and greatness of her character must consist; or whether she will, so early in youth, prostitute herself to the venal and corrupted artifices and corruptions of a stale and pampered Monarchy? Whatever his own opinions or suspicions may be respecting the tendency of the present Administration, and whatever may be the discussion of to-day, he should still preserve a hope that the increased representation, supported by the enlightened spirit of the people at large, will form an effectual resistance to the pressure of the whole vices of the Administration, and may yet establish the Government upon a broad, permanent, and Republican basis.

When Mr. GILES had concluded, the Committee rose, and reported an amendment, viz: to fill up the blank with the word "thirty-three;" which was carried in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 30, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers."

The House proceeded to consider the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for altering the times of holding the Circuit Courts in certain Districts of the United States, and for other purposes." Whereupon the said bill was amended at the Clerk's table, and was then read the third time and passed.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying sundry papers and documents, relative to the late campaign, under General St. Clair, transmitted pursuant to the directions of the President of the United States.

Ordered, That the said Letter and papers be referred to the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to extend the time heretofore granted for the payment of the duties on certain teas imported after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; and, no amendment being made thereto, read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

TUESDAY, April 10.

Ordered, That Mr. GENAY be appointed, in the room of Mr. SEDGWICK, on the committee to whom it was referred to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls," together with the amendments thereto, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to extend the time heretofore granted for the payment of the duties on certain teas, imported after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for apportioning Representatives among the several States, according to the first Enumeration, at the ratio of one for every thirty-three thousand persons in the respective States, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Hill, on behalf of himself and others, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene for a certain bond entered into by him for the public service, during the late war.

Mr. MUHLBERG, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Moses Young, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SENEY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to direct the settlement of a certain claim of the State of Maryland; which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene for a certain bond entered into by him for the public service, during the late war; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then the question being put, that the said bill, together with the amendments be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 23, as follows:

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said amendments be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, April 11.

A memorial of John de Neufville, late a citizen of and merchant in Amsterdam, but now of Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying to be reimbursed for sundry advances of money and supplies in support of the American cause, during the late war; also, for the losses he sustained in consequence of his exertions to produce a commercial treaty between Holland and the United States, and an acknowledgment of American Independence. Referred to the Secretary of State, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House, at the next session of Congress.

A petition of the inhabitants of the towns of Cincinnati and Columbia, and the settlements upon the Little Miami, in the Northwestern Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying to be quieted in their respective locations and settlements, to which they suppose themselves entitled, under the purchase made by John Cleves Symmes, and his associates, of the United States. Referred to Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. BENSON, Mr. MADISON, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, and Mr. BALDWIN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

An engrossed bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, for a certain bond entered into by him for the public service, during the late war, was read the third time; and the question being put that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, William B. Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for raising a farther sum of money for the protection of the frontiers; which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States." And having made further progress therein, an adjournment was called for: Whereupon, the several orders of the day were further postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 12.

A petition of John Gibbons, Treasurer of the State of Georgia, was presented to the House and read, praying that separate certificates may be issued for the pay of the officers of the late Georgia line, agreeably to a general certificate of the list of balances due them, signed by the late Commissioner of Army Accounts, and lodged in the Treasury thereof. Referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

THE MILITIA BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States;" and the two last amendments being read, for adding to the end of the bill the following sections, to wit:

X "And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to call out the Militia, or such part thereof, as the exigence may, in his opinion require, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. And when Militia are employed in the service of the United States, they shall receive the same pay and allowances as are now made to the troops in service."

X "And be it further enacted, That, if any officer or private soldier of the Militia, being ordered into the service of the United States, pursuant to the powers herein given, shall refuse obedience to such orders, he shall forfeit to the use of the United States a sum not exceeding the amount of one year's pay of such officer or soldier respectively, as herein established. And the Militia, while in the service of the United States, shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War. Provided, That the Courts Martial by whom they shall be subject to be tried, shall be composed entirely of Militia officers of the same State with the offenders."

A motion was made, and the question being put, to amend the first of the said amendments, by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, always, That the powers herein given to the President of the United States for calling the Militia into service, be and continue in force until the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 20, as follows:

Pending the consideration of the foregoing amendments the following debate took place:

Mr. MERCER opposed the section empowering the President of the United States to call out the Militia. He considered the subject too important to receive a hasty decision; and as the section is so near its close, and no immediate necessity exists to make the provision, he hoped it would be postponed to the next session.

Mr. STEELE objected to the section; he considered it as having an inauspicious aspect; that it was an insult to the majesty of the people to hold out the idea that it may be necessary to execute the laws at the point of the bayonet. He moved, as an amendment, "that nothing in this act shall be construed to empower the President to march the militia of one State into another." He said he had no doubt that there were in every State a sufficient number of persons well informed, and attached to Government, to quell any insurrection, and to restore good order.

Mr. BENSON supported the section. He observed that the question must be met some time or other; and he conceived that it would be a perfect nullity to pass a militia law without the provision contemplated by the amendment; for, he asked, to what purpose is it to constitute a militia, if they are not to be made any use of to support the laws? According to a doctrine which was avowed in the House yesterday, the institution of a militia is to enable the individual States to oppose the encroachments which may be made on them by the General Government! This, he conceived, was an entire new doctrine; such a doctrine as was never before heard of. What sort of Government must that be, which is authorized to pass laws, and at the same time has no power to carry those laws into execution? He said that such a discretionary power was lodged in the Supreme Executive of the several States, and for exactly the same purposes specified in the amendment; and he had never heard it objected to before. Gentlemen contend that this power is proper, as it respects the several States, but highly improper as it respects the Government of the United States. What sort of a situation, said he, does this place this Government in?

Mr. WILLIAMSON objected to the amendment, as imperfect in its construction, and as containing some dangerous principles. He said that Mr. LIVERMORE also opposed the amendment. Mr. LIVERMORE opposed the amendment, as resting a dangerous power in the Supreme Executive; that circumstances did not render the delegation necessary. The people of the several States appear disposed to submit to the laws, and such an exigency ought not to be anticipated.

Mr. MURRAY said he had voted in the affirmative of the amendment which had just been annexed to the amendment from the Senate, because it limited the duration of a power which struck his mind as rather large and undefined as to its objects. He should now vote against the whole as amended; and he was at liberty so to do, inasmuch as he had voted for the amendment, because he wished, if the gift of such power was to be made, to circumscribe, at least, its duration. He professed himself a friend to energetic Government, but wished to communicate such energy through well defined channels, and to see it directed towards constitutional objects. He would go as far as most men in enforcing the laws of the Union; in providing for the calling out of the strength of the community to preserve peace and repel force; but he could not accede to the idea contained in the provision of that section; which was, that the time, the cause, and the place in which the militia were to be called out, should be all left to the discretion of one man. The theory of the Government warranted no such dereliction of power in this House, nor its delegation to another. He imagined that, as the Constitution had contemplated the organizing of the militia separately from the provision for calling them into actual service, it would be most proper to separate these different objects in legislation. He, therefore, hoped the amendment, as amended, would be negatived; and that a committee would be appointed immediately to bring in a bill to accomplish its objects with proper modifications. To create and organize a militia, was one thing—to provide for calling it forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, was another and separate object. These things were as separate in their nature, as they were diversified by relative inferiority and magnitude of objects. The ingenuity with which a weapon is formed, bears no comparison with the principles and wisdom under which its use and direction are to be applied. Of all the offices of politics, the most irksome and delicate is that by which a Legislature directs the military force of the community to its own conservation, as it presupposes situations in which resistance to the Government itself is contemplated. Hence, we see a jealousy even in England of the use of the sword, when drawn against any part of the community. It was surely the duty of Congress to define, with as much accuracy as possible, those situations which are to justify the execution in its interposition of a military force. The bill he had in view, he hoped, would attempt to mark with precision the objects the Constitution looked towards, under the words "execute the laws of the Union, and suppress insurrections." What was the occasion to warrant force of that species, was the first object: Who was to judge of its existence, was another: The space or district to which the draft should be or not be confined, was another. And the duration of the service, another. Among these considerations, it could not be forgotten that the civil arm was ever to be united, if not commanding; and how far the Marshals and Judges of the Courts of the Union ought not to have a power on this subject, deserved more time than the House seemed inclined at present to give this bill. He would take the occasion to declare he had no jealousy as to abuses of power; but this Government is to be administered according to written law, applying to defined objects and situations. It was a Government of definition, and not of trust and discretion. After the objects are well described upon which the military force is to act, the evidence of the occasion settled, and the sphere and duration limited, he would heartily support the most energetic mode in which the object should be reached, and the occasion obeyed. He therefore hoped the amendment would be negatived, and leave given for a committee to bring in a separate bill. The main question being now put that this House do agree to the said amendment, as amended, it passed in the negative—Yeas 24, nays 37, as follows: Yeas.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, John W. Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said amendment.

The last amendment was then again read, and on the question put thereupon, was disagreed to.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for calling forth the militia, when necessary, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; and that Mr. WHITE, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. MURRAY, be the said committee.

Ordered, That the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said Courts, and for jurors and witnesses," together with the amendments thereto, which were reported by a committee on the fourth instant, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Ordered, That Mr. FINDLEY be appointed, in the room of Mr. GERRY, on the committee to whom it was referred to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

Proceedings.

[APRIL, 1792.]

This being the first instance in which a court of justice had declared a law of Congress to be unconstitutional, the novelty of the case produced a variety of opinions with respect to the measures to be taken on the occasion. At length a committee of five was appointed to inquire into the facts contained in the memorial, and to report thereon.

During the course of the debate, it was mentioned that the Judges of the Circuit Court, in the State of New York, had consented to examine invalids pursuant to the law in question, but on this principle: Congress, they thought, have a right in appointing commissioners for any special purpose, to designate the persons, as well by any official titles with which they are vested, as by their proper names; wherefore, although they would not, in their judicial capacity, undertake the examination of invalids; yet, as commissioners, they devoted each day an hour to the business, after the adjournment of the Court.

Mr. MURRAY urged the necessity of passing a law to point out some regular mode in which the Judges of the Courts of the United States shall give official notice of their refusal to act under any law of Congress, on the ground of unconstitutionality.

No regular motion, however, was made on the subject, which lies over for future consideration.

MONDAY, April 16.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the inhabitants of the town of Newark, praying compensation for an Academy which was destroyed by the enemy during the late war, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the United States enclosing a copy of a Letter from the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States, held for the New York district; and of their opinion and agreement respecting the "Act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said Courts, and for jurors and witnesses," together with the amendments thereto; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the same under consideration, and made some amendments thereto; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table. The several orders of the day were further postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, April 17.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his reports on the several petitions of Simon Nathan, Mary Wooster, Daniel Ellis, and Samuel How, executors of John How, deceased. Ezra Stiles, on behalf of the President and Fellows of Yale College, in Connecticut, and of Philip Verplank; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report of the amount and value of exports from each State for one year, pursuant to an order of the second instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating such farther appropriations of money as will be necessary for the services of the present year; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FRIZZMONS, Mr. BENSON, and Mr. KEY, with instruction to report thereon by way of bill or bills.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the several petitions of Lewis Van Woort, Jacob Green, and others, surviving partners of Nathaniel Green and Company, Benjamin Van Fossan, administrator of Peter Van Fossan, deceased, Thomas Hart, John Holbrook, Ludwig Kuhn, Levy Bartleson, Abiel Smith, William Harris, Webb & White, John Crumpton, and Griffith Jones, respectively praying compensation for supplies furnished during the late war; also, on the several petitions of Abraham Darling-ton, John Wilson, John Franklin, Mary McCullen, Christian Harner, William Lane, Peter Miller, John Jones, Adolphus Brower, John Harly, Henry Walton, and Richard Green, respectively praying compensation for damages done, and property taken, by the army of the United States during the late war; also, on the several petitions of Christian Knipe, John Smyth, Nathaniel Tracy, and Roger McLean, respectively praying compensation for transportation during the late war; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on sundry papers referred to him, concerning a marine hospital at the town of Washington, in the State of Virginia, and on the memorial of the Marine Society of Boston, on the subject of marine hospitals; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. AMES, Mr. STERRETT, and Mr. PARKER.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing a grant and conveyance of certain lands to the Ohio Company of Associates," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for raising a farther sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers; and, after some time spent therein, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, April 18.

Mr. BOUNDNOT, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Haburn, respecting the refusal of the Judges of the Circuit Court for the district of Pennsylvania, to execute an act passed at the present session, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOUNDNOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for settling the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States; which was received, and read the first time.

A petition of Charles Colwill and John Robertson was presented to the House and read, praying to be paid the amount of their ransom from slavery among the Algerines, together with their expenses in traveling from Algiers to Scotland, and from thence to America; as also, that measures may be taken for procuring the ransom or relief from slavery of Captains O'Brien and Stephens, with their respective crews, being citizens of the United States, and now in slavery at Algiers. Referred to Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. LIVERMORE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the VICE PRESIDENT having requested and obtained leave of absence from the Senate for the remainder of the session, RICHARD HENRY LEE was duly elected President of the Senate pro tempore; also, that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed. The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had made several amendments thereto; which were severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have resolved that the bill sent from this House entitled "An act to extend the time heretofore granted for the payment of the duties on certain teas, imported after the third day of March, 1791," do not pass to a third reading.

THURSDAY, April 19.

A bill for settling the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States was read the second time, and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill relative to the compensations to certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of the merchants of Philadelphia, relative to the erection of piers for the convenience of the navigation of the river Delaware; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. VINING, and Mr. KEY, with instructions to prepare and bring in a bill pursuant thereto.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House yesterday to the "bill for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers;" and the same being read were further amended, and agreed to.

A motion being made to enhance the duty on imported hemp and cordage, and to strike out imported cotton from articles exempted from duty—Mr. BOURNE said, he hoped this increase would not be agreed to; the navigation of the United States would suffer by it, as the supply furnished by the cultivation of that article was not competent to the demand.

Mr. WHITS said, that on the principle of uniformity, he thought this duty ought to be raised; but when it is considered that many of the duties are designed to encourage the manufactures of the United States, he thought that equal attention should be paid to the agricultural interest, an interest as important as any other, at least.

Mr. WILLIAMSON supported the amendment. He said the independence of the United States, in respect to its navigation, was so important an object, that he conceived everything ought to be done to effect it. Among others, proper encouragement should be given to the raising of hemp, especially when it is considered that we have a greater proportion of land than any other country; that experiments have proved that it can be raised to advantage; that it will, if duly encouraged, conduce to rooting out the cultivation of tobacco, which impoverishes the soil, and is a mere article of luxury. He was at a loss to account for the omission of this duty in the first instance.

Mr. PARKER supported the amendment. He enlarged on the good policy of affording this encouragement. He said, if the gentleman who moves to disagree to the amendment, had proposed to reduce the duty on canvas, he thought it would be more consistent; and, in this case, he should be willing to relinquish this enhanced duty on hemp.

Mr. GOODHUE said he should agree to the enhanced duty.

Mr. LAURANCE opposed it, principally on account of its being a tax on a raw material, and a very essential one, too, to the navigation and commerce of the United States.

Mr. MADISON offered some remarks in favor of the enhanced duty.

The amendment was agreed to. Foreign cotton being inserted among the articles to be exempted from duty—

Mr. MAISON moved that it should be struck out. He thought it best that the duty should be continued. Great quantities, he said, were raised in the Southern States, for which they could not find a market.

Mr. AMES opposed the motion. He said there were manufactures carried on in the United States which required foreign cotton. Some things could not be manufactured without cotton of a particular staple. He further remarked, that the encouragement to the raising of cotton depends on the manufactures formed from it; hence he inferred that this very encouragement is suspended on a due attention to the manufactures.

Mr. STEELE stated sundry particulars, to show that the cotton raised in the Southern States was adapted to every species of manufactures; and depending on encouragement from Government, the farmers of North Carolina had gone largely into the cultivation of that article. It is well known, said he, that the situation of the three Southern States is favorable to the raising of hemp and cotton; and, on the principles of reciprocity, he thought it but just and equal to extend encouragement to the agricultural interest of those States.

Mr. BALDWIN observed, that he could have wished the gentleman had mentioned the particular species of cotton, which was so necessary in the manufactures, that could not be procured from the Southern States. He said that there were two sorts of cotton raised there—one of a short, the other of a long staple; and under due encouragement, they would in a few years raise every description of that article.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. KITTERA, supported the motion for striking out the article.

Mr. PAGE, in favor of the duty, observed, that the gentleman [Mr. AMES] who had expressed his fears that American cotton would not suit the manufacturers, might lay aside his fears, for he knew from experience the contrary. That even if what had been said of the cotton of the United States were true, he knew that there was reason to believe that the cotton of the West and East Indies would grow even in Virginia—that both had been lately introduced into that State. Such fears, he said, might upon examination perhaps be traced to the same origin with some formerly introduced into Virginia; that the sheep of America were only useful as food, their wool being unfit for the woollen manufacture. He added, he well remembered it was with difficulty some people were convinced that the salt water of America would yield salt. He said, for his part, he should as easily be persuaded that the fish of the United States were unfit for food, and as incapable of being cured so as to be merchantable, as that the cotton of America was unfit for the cotton manufactories; he therefore, advised the worthy member to be upon his guard against such insinuations. As to himself, Mr. P. declared, he had no idea that any member of either House could wish to injure the interests of any of the States; but, he said, he was authorized to suppose that as the manufacturers in general were foreigners, they had their prepossessions and prejudices, which might give rise to the opinions entertained by some gentlemen respecting the unfitness of our cotton for manufacture; but he averred that whatever gave rise to them, they were ill-founded, as he had often seen and worn in the late war, cotton cloth and stockings, as good and fine as ever had been imported. As to encouraging the manufactures, however, said he, I have ever thought it foreign to the business of Congress, and if not so, a mere taking from one hand and giving to another; a delicate affair, which might be misunderstood and misapplied; however, as it is thrown in before us, I take my share for my constituents.

As to the fears of the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KITTERA] that the culture of cotton may injure the farmer, Mr. P. said, he could assure him that he had found cotton a good preparative for wheat, and that lands where he lived, which had been worn out with tobacco, yielded excellent cotton, and left the ground in fine order for wheat, and that cotton, if properly encouraged, would be a good substitute for tobacco.

A motion was then made, and the question put, to amend the said bill by adding to the end thereof the following clause:

"And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue until the — day of —, and until the next session of Congress which shall happen thereafter, and no longer; and that, from and after the expiration of the same, the duties hereby extinguished and repealed shall be revived, collected, and appropriated, in the same manner they would have been had this act never been passed."

The yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, were taken, and stood—yeas 32, nays 31.

Whereupon, the SPEAKER declared himself with the nays. And so the said question was lost.

Those who voted in the affirmative are as follows:

Those who voted in the negative are—NAYS.—Jonathan Trumbull, Speaker, Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John W. Kittera, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, John Vining, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and Artemas Ward.

FRIDAY, April 20.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the memorial of Eliphalet Ladd; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. MURRAY, with instruction to prepare and bring in a bill or bills making a general provision for the case of the petitioner and others in similar circumstances.

A petition of divers citizens and inhabitants of the State of North Carolina was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will authorize the Assembly of the said State to lay a duty by way of tonnage or toll on vessels coming over the Bar and Swash and Croatan Shoals, for the express purpose of deepening the same, and thereby removing the obstruction to the navigation leading to the towns of Edenton, Washington, and Newbern.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. TUCKER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

PUBLICATION OF THE DEBATES.

Before the House proceeded to the order of the day—

Mr. GERRY said, that the circumstance of a publication which had made its appearance that morning induced him to rise for the purpose of bringing forward a proposition respecting a full and impartial publication of the debates of that House. Every gentleman, he believed, would agree with him that, from a publication of this kind, the citizens of the United States would derive such information respecting the proceedings of the Legislature, and the principles on which the laws are grounded, as must be productive of the most salutary effects, and attach the people more strongly to the General Government; but that ex parte publications can have no other tendency than to misrepresent their proceedings, and alienate the affections of the citizens. He therefore moved the following resolution:

“Whereas an impartial publication of the Debates of Congress, stating accurately their Legislative measures, and the reasons urged for and against them, is a desirable object, inasmuch as it may aid the Executive in administering the Government, the Judiciary in expounding the laws, the Government and citizens of the several States in forming a judgment of the conduct of their respective Representatives, and Congress themselves in revising and amending their Legislative proceedings: And whereas, from the want of proper arrangements, such publication has not been accomplished—

Resolved, That — persons, of good reputation, and skilled in the art of stenography, be, at the next session, appointed by ballot, to take and publish, impartially and accurately, the Legislative subjects which may be submitted to the consideration of the House, and the debates thereon of the members respectively; that the persons so to be appointed be considered as officers of the House, and provided for accordingly; that they be severally qualified by oath to a faithful discharge of the trust; and that such regulations shall be prescribed, as may be necessary to protect them in attaining the salutary objects of their appointment.”

This (Mr. G. said) was a subject which ought no longer to be overlooked. Whilst Congress sat at New York, great uneasiness had been occasioned in the House by the mode in which the debates were published. Sometimes members were introduced as uttering arguments directly the reverse of what they had advanced. At other times, the substance of the arguments, as published, wore an aspect widely different from what they had when offered in debate. In some instances, their arguments were so garbled that they themselves were unable to recognise them in print; in others, they were disfigured with grammatical errors, and rendered totally unintelligible; and, on many occasions, the arguments on one side of the question only were published.

Such were the effects produced by this mode of publication that a gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BURKE] brought forward a motion for correcting those evils, which was debated for some time. After the subject had been two or three times under discussion, the House was informed that there was a probability of care being taken in future to correct the errors; and thus the matter was passed over.

Mr. G. then mentioned a circumstance which he had learned from a gentleman who had declared he could prove it on oath before the House, if called upon, viz: that, having asked one of those persons who at that time published the debates, how he could think of publishing them so inaccurately? the answer was, “that he was under a necessity of obliging his employers.” Hence, he concluded that there must have been a corrupt faction who influenced that short-hand writer.

When Congress first came to this city, the debates were published pretty accurately; and so they were this session, in some of the papers, but in others, the case was otherwise; and he himself, as well as other gentlemen, had been under a necessity of publicly contradicting them in print. In some of the debates, the answer to an argument was published before the argument itself made its appearance; on other occasions, they were published very fully on one side of the question, whilst nothing appeared on the other. Every gentleman, he believed, would admit that this was a true state of the business; and it was well known that, on many important occasions, no debates had been published at all.

The want of regularity in the publication was, he supposed, owing, in some measure, to the want of proper encouragement, as the printers of newspapers would not probably find their account in allowing a sufficient compensation to induce short-hand writers to devote their whole time to the business.

Mr. G. then read from the American Daily Advertiser (of Friday last) the following passage:

“A warm debate hereupon took place, during the course of which, one gentleman, who strenuously supported the motion, was several times interrupted. Appearances were expressed of dangerous consequences, in case his speech should appear in print; and an honorable member, who opposed the motion, [Mr. GERRY,] declared that the manner in which the debates of Congress had been published, and the business conducted, during the present session, had a direct tendency to bring about a dissolution of the Union.

“As the honorable gentleman did not further explain himself, we are at a loss to determine whether he meant to tax the publishers of the debates with inaccuracy in stating them wrong, — or imprudence, in stating them right, and freely publishing whatever sentiments any member of that House may think proper to express, in the constitutional exercise of the freedom of debate. But, certain we are, that he could not mean to stigmatize them as actuated by partiality, undue influence, or sinister motives of any kind.”

Here (said Mr. G.) an idea was held up that the gentleman who had spoken first [Mr. MERCER] was interrupted. But it is not said that I was interrupted, too. I was interrupted as often as he. The House can determine whether I have ever taken any measures to prevent a free and candid publication of the debates. On the contrary, I have always endeavored to obtain it; and I will still proceed to accomplish it as far as possible. I think neither this House, nor any of its members, ought to be subject to publications of this kind. If they are, they will be obliged either to enter into paper wars with printers, or to relinquish the public good. It is incumbent on the House to take measures to prevent misrepresentation. I therefore submit to the House the resolution which I have read; and I hope that, if the proposition itself appears worthy of their attention, they will take it into consideration; or, if it wants any amendment, they will refer it to a committee; for I think the subject ought not to be any longer neglected.

Mr. MERCER.—I second the motion; and I think the publication which the honorable gentleman has read to the House contains but a fair statement of facts. The gentleman, in the course of the former debate, made some very strange allusions to what was said by me, which were wholly unauthorized. I consider it as a primary object in this Government that we should on this floor be at all times free to express our sentiments of the Government, without involving the Government itself. I consider such a measure as is now contemplated to be well worthy the serious attention of the House. We are at a distance from our constituents; and it is a misfortune that we are withdrawn from their inspection, by being placed in a part of the Union where it is not easy to compare our circumstances and conduct in private life with the motives which may be supposed to influence our political conduct. Our constituents ought to be acquainted with our proceedings here; and it is only from a full and accurate publication of the debates of this House that they can obtain any satisfactory information on the subject.

Mr. GERRY said, that the paragraph he had read did not contain a full statement of facts, as the apprehensions he had expressed were only in case the arguments should go “unanswered.”

Mr. GILES made, and Mr. W. SMITH seconded, a motion for referring the resolution to a select committee, to report such regulation as they may think necessary for the publication of the debates.

An additional reason for the reference was, that some alteration in the wording appeared necessary, to [Mr. SMITH,] so far as respects the Judiciary, &c.

Mr. BORDINOR objected to the commitment, as he thought it a subject of considerable consequence, and there would not be time to take it up during the present session, the House having already out-sat the time which the other branch of the Legislature had proposed for the adjournment. This was his only objection; otherwise, he was far from being opposed to the measure.

Mr. GILES thought the consequence of letting the matter lie over till next session would be, that it would die away, and nothing would be done. Unless some steps be taken during the present session, no persons would come forward as candidates at the commencement of the next. But if a committee report on the subject, the House may determine what steps are to be taken, and people will be prepared accordingly.

The question being taken on the commitment, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 22.

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to Mr. GERRY, Mr. MERCER, Mr. LEE, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, and Mr. KITTEA.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill which lay on the table “for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers.”

Mr. PAGE rose to renew the motion which he made yesterday, that the bill before the House might be recommitted.

I observed then, said Mr. P., that having been reminded of my duty by gentlemen who said that they had not brought any other plan of ways and means before the House, if they objected to that proposed by the Secretary, had not done their duty, I arose then to show how far I had done my duty, and how far I was willing to perform it. I informed the House that as I did not approve of the Secretary's third plan (that which the House had adopted) I had proposed to the leading members (an expression which gave offence to some gentlemen, but which I explained as meaning no more than members who take the lead in business, and to whom I confessed myself obliged for their services, and whom, when they lead rightly, I was willing to follow) an adoption of the Secretary's second plan, but not meeting with their approbation, I then joined my friends in endeavors to amend the bill; failing in this, and called on to do my duty, I rise to move that the bill be recommitted. Had gentlemen, sir, done what they promised they would do, if the House would apply to the Secretary of the Treasury for a plan of ways and means, I should have no occasion to make this motion. They promised that they would freely and boldly examine his report, and listen attentively to every proposition which could be opposed to it; but have they done this? No; they embraced without hesitation the third plan proposed by the Secretary, as if it were because he said it was the best of the three, without offering either of the other two plans to the House, although the second had been proposed by a member from Massachusetts [Mr. GOUGH] before the House had agreed to apply to the Secretary for his opinion. I hope, therefore, that those gentlemen will now agree to recommend the bill, that we may have an opportunity of trying whether one of the two other plans proposed by the Secretary, or some other, may not be preferable to that adopted in the bill; or, if not, let us at least see whether the plan which has been adopted may not be simplified; for there appears no shadow of reason for repealing an act for establishing a permanent revenue, to re-enact it in a bill for raising a sum of money for a temporary purpose—the business of a campaign—nor can there be any propriety in passing a bill for the defence of the frontiers, which is in fact a bill for the encouragement of manufactures, and of the fisheries, and for increasing the Sinking Fund, and also for the introduction of a Stamp Act.

If the Committee of the Whole will not adopt the first plan proposed by the Secretary, I mean that for disposing of the interest in the Bank of the United States, which I confess I should prefer to laying the excessive duties proposed in the third plan, and which are to be levied by the bill before you; nor the second plan, which was once so well recommended by the member from Massachusetts, at least I hope they will simplify the bill, by striking out what is foreign to its purpose; that is, the repeal of the former revenue law; and the indirect introduction of a Stamp Act; if we are to have a Stamp Act, and I have no objection to one, let it be introduced fairly and openly, and stand by itself. For my part, I think it a sufficient reason to recommit the bill, to amend it so that it may show at one view not only for what purpose the additional duties are to be laid, but what they are. As the bill now stands, they are so bleaded with other duties, that no man can see in what manner the sum wanted is to be raised. I know I shall be said to be a bad financier, if I propose to sell out our stock in the bank. I agree that the Secretary's reason against selling now, when stocks are so low, is good; but I know that I speak like the representative of plain dealing, honest Republicans, when I propose rather to sell out their stock in the bank, than to lay additional taxes on them, and increase the duty on imports to such a degree as to introduce smuggling, which must be destructive of their morals, ruinous to their revenue, and which may undermine even their manufactures, which these duties were intended to protect; for, as I remarked on a former occasion, if you go beyond a certain point in taxing imports, you will tempt smugglers to introduce articles with which they will undersell the fair trader and the manufacturer. I confess, however, that as we have an interest in the bank, which may be usefully applied to sinking the national debt—I am willing to apply it to that purpose—and that I prefer the Secretary's second plan to the one the House has adopted. If the bill be committed, I shall be pleased to find the Committee disposed to adopt that. By the plan now in the bill, we are in the first instance to borrow the money wanted. Why, if we are to lay an additional duty, may we not lay only enough to pay the interest annually, and the principal by instalments? This, I think, must be much more agreeable to our constituents, than to pay the whole sum required by taxes in one year. I see not why we should increase the duties on imported articles rather than on tonnage. I think an additional duty on foreign tonnage, or, if Congress have the courage to lay it, on vessels of nations not in alliance with us, would easily raise a sum for the discharge of the loan necessary on this occasion; and I am of opinion that it is high time to increase the tonnage on such vessels; it is more than two years since this House declared that it would lay an additional duty on the tonnage of vessels of a certain nation, if it would not make a commercial alliance with our States. I know it is said that such a measure might impede a treaty; but, sir, no nation upon earth has a right to resent such a step, nor can we be injured by retaliation. As to a treaty, I doubt much whether we stand in need of one. I fear the business of treaties is better understood elsewhere than here, and that Foreign Ministers might be an overmatch for us in such negotiations. I had rather regulate our commerce, so as to induce the country with which we wish to trade upon advantageous terms, to grant us such terms; at all events, I should aim at increasing our revenue in this manner. If we cannot extend our commerce, and at present I would avoid an increase of duty on imports, I think that the lands in the Western Territory should be sold, and tonnage increased, before we lay any further burden on imported articles—a burden which must be unequally felt by the different States. I hope, therefore, that the bill will be recommitted, and so amended, that it may pass by a great majority.

Mr. HARTLEY made some observations in opposition to the motion. The motion to recommit was negatived.

The bill then being open to amendments, Mr. WILLIAMSON objected to the section which exempted books imported for Colleges and Academies from a duty, and after stating some reasons for his opinion, moved to amend the section by striking out the clause making this exception.

This motion, after some debate, was agreed to. The bill being further amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

SATURDAY, April 21.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the several petitions of Josias Clapham, John Higby, John Elias Moore, William Arnold, William Albaugh, and Margaret Crowell, executors of Henry Crowell, deceased; Daniel Freet; Laurana Richardson, administratrix of George Richardson, deceased; Elizabeth Mark, widow of George Mark, deceased; Henry Lee, William Graham, jr., William Baker, William Jones, Daniel Schermerhorn, John Crane, Peter Huber, John Hays, Daniel Robbins, John Polhemus, Thomas Donnellan, Stephen Remington, Samuel Skillman, John Hayden, Job Kittrede, Ebenezer Whittemore, and Martha Whittemore, heirs of William Kittredge, deceased, and William Robinson, respectively, praying the renewal of certain certificates, which are alleged to have been destroyed or lost; which report was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. LEE, Mr. STERRETT, and Mr. THATCHER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of sundry merchants and others, inhabitants of the city of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that an act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States may be passed, under such restrictions and with such limitations as Congress shall think just. Referred to the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

An engrossed bill for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers was read the third time, and the blanks therein filled; and, on the question that the said bill do pass—

Mr. PAGE made the following remarks: If the bill were what its title says it is, I should be the last man in this House to vote against it. But it is so different from what its title represents it to be, that this, added to the objections which I have already made and heard against it, I shall vote against its passage. Sir, it is not a bill for the protection of the frontiers, but for the encouragement of certain manufactures, and of the fisheries, and for the increase of the Sinking Fund. It is a bill very different from what it ought to be, and is about to pass, from what has fallen from some gentlemen, as a compromise for the assumption of the State debts, and an encouragement to the manufacturers and fisheries. Such compromise I cannot approve of; and such a bill I cannot vote for. If it be thrown out, I think we may bring in one to answer its purpose much better. It is improper to entangle this bill with matter foreign to it. There is no occasion to repeal the act for establishing a permanent revenue to blend it with this bill.

Mr. MURRAY said he was in favor of the bill. A great and unexpected calamity had called on the country for money for the support of a necessary and increased army. In the discussion of this bill there had been a perpetual reiteration of objection by some members as to the inexpediency and impolicy of a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion. This might have been all very fair before the reference was made, and his report obtained, but was not altogether absolutely necessary now, when the question was not a reference, but the best mode of raising the sum wanted. He had, however, been convinced of this, that had the faith of the House rested itself on the powers of those who perpetually recur to the reference, and who propose nothing themselves, little could have been accomplished. For surely if those who, in the midst of a general call for the exercise of invention and judgment, contempt themselves with complaints at the mode in which the resources of the country have been shown to us, we must conclude that either they have not power, or want inclination to originate or to amend—a fair field has been open to both.

We had been called on to raise five hundred and fifty odd thousand dollars to defray the expenses of a frontier defence; we referred the mode of raising the sum to the Secretary, still retaining what we could not yield—the power of altering, amending, or wholly rejecting the report of that officer. He said that he had voted the reference for reasons which he would not again repeat. Satisfied, as he now was, that he had been then right, he would now vote for the measure, which, with some amendments on the Secretary's system, had arisen from the report. The opposition to the reference at first seemed to him to be founded among other reasons in a properly grounded consciousness of some members in their own ability to do without official assistance. He had imagined, however, that when the report came to be taken up, it would not have been treated with merely naked opposition. He hoped, and he declared himself sincere in the expectation, that some gentlemen, whose distinguished talents fitted them for something better than the mere prevention of evil, would have favored the committee with plans of their own, and at all events have joined in improving and correcting, not merely by limitation of time, but by supplying and ingrafting strength where there might be weakness, and a substitute of something better where there was merely good. When the bill came into discussion he expected that when gentlemen opposed one proposition they would candidly have given an election of a better by proposing something of their own. Where there was no alternative presented, there could be no choice; and it was natural to expect where proof is given of the badness of one system, the judgment should have a chance of comparing what is alleged to be defective with that which is more eligible and perfect. But he lamented that gentlemen had offered nothing like an alternative in the very moment when their efforts seemed to be directed to defeat a bill, for which they neither promised nor offered a substitute. Had the same ingenuity, that appeared to pride itself in its power of impeding, been exercised in its ability to create, to amend, and to propose, he had not a doubt but that a yet more perfect and better digested system had been the result. As he was bound to no particular lesson of finance, he would have met the propositions of members with partiality, and exercised his judgment with deference and candor. On all sides it was agreed that the local feelings and knowledge of the nation were here; they ought, then, occasionally in the progress of the bill to have here suggested the claims of particular interests, and in all practicable cases to have ingrafted them; this was done in some instances, particularly the protecting duties by which the hemp and cotton of the Southern States, and the iron of the Middle States, are encouraged and established. He said he would not detain the House but with a few remarks why the bill appeared not only defensible, but good. The predominant feature of it was its nationality, as it respected impartial, and, as far as circumstances admit, equal justice and encouragement to the interests and raw materials of the respective States. It presented a point in which the relative interests of the country, and the various resources of its natural riches, had been combined with skill and harmony. A temper of conciliation had actuated members in the several exemptions and protections which they had brought forward; this was a principle invaluable in a Government whose very soul results from that union in which the natural, but distinct and variant, resources of the country could alone flourish.

They can furnish but by combination and mutual aid. Had the bill no other good, it contained this, that it exhibited a striking proof to all the world that, in the various natural endowments of a country so variously gifted, there existed such a character of relation to each other as to secure great internal wealth and prosperity when combined together, and when acted on by a desire to render the natural wealth and raw materials of one State instrumental to the industry and happiness of another. In this bill the raw materials of the more southern States are protected, and made to serve the purposes of industry and manufacture in the more northern States. Manufacturers would indeed be a favored class of the community if the same protecting duties which secured to them the chances of trade, did not at the same time secure to the agricultural interests a sure market for the raw materials of which the manufacture is composed.

In the early stages of this bill several gentlemen complained of the preference shown to the manufacturing parts of the country, and it was said that the protecting duties would operate exclusively in the Eastern States. When, however, on the completion of this bill, we see the reciprocity under which the agricultural and the manufacturing interests have been viewed and cherished, we must be forced to own both the liberal and conciliating spirit with which the House has been moved, as well as the mutual dependence on which these apparently opposite interests really are supported. In the instances of hemp and cotton, to which the more southern States are best adapted, we see such a preference given that the duties on these articles of foreign growth almost amount to exclusion. Thus the cotton and the hemp of the South will be carried to supply the manufactures of the North, agriculture be gradually invited and drawn into activity and internal supply, and the bands of the Union drawn amicably tighter by a mutual and habitual dependence of each and all the States in the wants and productions of each other. The iron and steel of the Middle States were likewise protected, and as far perhaps as our experience permitted experiment, the domestic resources of the country were nursed and guarded. While the raw materials of the growth of the country have thus a preference, manufacture and agriculture will go hand in hand; and political union, thus enlivened by commercial barter, as it is the only medium through which their mutual prosperities are produced and harmonized, will prove by experience the blessing which all have hoped for.

The objection of some gentlemen that the protection of manufactures was not the original object of the bill, he did not think a sound one. Several modes of raising the sum, which is our first object, were held out as alternatives. This mode, by imposts, was the most liked. The line of taxation being once adopted, the protection of manufactures naturally arose out of the thing itself. It arose not as a prime object, but as a necessary incident. He thought the bill would insure productive revenue; and he thought the collateral benefit, as it touched a production of the natural riches of the country, a high recommendation.

The question on passing the bill was then taken, and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 20, as follows:

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS' CLAIMS.

A Message was received from the President of the United States laying before Congress the copy of a letter which he had received from the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States held for the Pennsylvania District, relatively to the "Act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

The copy of the Letter referred to in the said Message was read, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, April 18, 1792.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: To you it officially belongs to "take care that the laws" of the United States "be faithfully executed." Before you, therefore, we think it our duty to lay the sentiments which, on a late painful occasion, governed us, with regard to an act passed by the Legislature of the Union.

The people of the United States have vested in Congress all Legislative powers "granted in the Constitution."

They have vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress shall establish, "the Judicial power of the United States."

It is worthy of remark that, in Congress, the whole Legislative power of the United States is not vested. An important part of that power was exercised by the people themselves, when they "ordained and established the Constitution."

"This Constitution" is "the supreme law of the land." This supreme law "all Judicial officers of the United States are bound, by oath or affirmation, to support." It is a principle important to freedom, that, in Government, the Judicial should be distinct from, and independent of, the Legislative department. To this important principle the people of the United States in forming their Constitution, have manifested the highest regard.

They have placed their Judicial power, not in Congress, but in "Courts." They have ordained, that the "Judges" of those courts shall hold their offices "during good behaviour;" and that "during their continuance in office, their salaries shall not be diminished."

Congress have lately passed an act, "to regulate" (among other things) "the claims of invalid pensions." Upon due consideration we have been unanimously of opinion that, under this act, the Circuit Court, held for the Pennsylvania district, could not proceed:

1. Because the business, directed by this act, is not of a Judicial nature; it forms no part of the power vested, by the Constitution, in the Courts of the United States; the Circuit Court must consequently have proceeded without constitutional authority.

2. Because, if, upon that business, the Court had proceeded, its judgments (for its opinions are its judgments) might, under the same act, have been revised and controlled by the Legislature, and by an officer in the Executive Department; such revision and control we deemed radically inconsistent with independence of that Judicial power which is vested in the courts; and, consequently, with that important principle, which is so strictly observed by the Constitution of the United States.

These, sir, are the reasons of our conduct. Be assured that, though it became necessary, it was far from being pleasant. To be obliged to act contrary either to the obvious directions of Congress, or to a constitutional principle, in our judgment, equally obvious, excited feeling in us, which we hope never to experience again.

We have the honor to be, with the most perfect consideration and respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servants,

JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
RICHARD PETERS.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the sale of lands in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; which was received and read the first time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of Robert Neil; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the recruiting service, and to report thereupon to the House; and that Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. MOORE, and Mr. THATCHER, be the said committee.

MONDAY, April 23.

A bill providing for the sale of land in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates; and that Mr. DAYTON, Mr. TREDWELL, and Mr. GILMAN, be of the said committee.

THE MILITIA BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions:

The second section of the bill being under consideration—

Mr. LIVERMORE, objected to the general terms used in this section; he thought the nature of the offences intended to be guarded against, ought to be more particularly defined, that the sources from whence complaints should issue should be pointed out.

Mr. BENSON was in favor of introducing the express words of the Constitution, and moved to strike out certain expressions for the purpose of substituting those words.

Mr. WARREN observed, that the objections which had now been started were considered by the Committee, and attempts were made to render the clause more express and definite, but it was found they only rendered it more obscure.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he considered the objection of the gentleman from New York as involving a dangerous principle. It seems to suppose that the General Government only possesses the power to suppress insurrections; whereas the States individually certainly possess this power; they can suppress insurrections, and will do it; their interest is involved in supporting the laws, and they are fully competent to do it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the gentleman from New Hampshire objects to the clause because it is not particular enough; while the gentleman from New York thinks it not general enough; he thought that the clause was very well expressed; it adopts that medium which in such cases is perhaps always the safest.

Mr. PAGE.—I move to strike out the clause—it cannot be amended; I hope there is no occasion for such a clause; it holds out an idea of resistance which I will not suppose can exist. Mild and equitable laws will not be resisted; and if Congress should be so infatuated as to enact those of a contrary nature, I hope they will be repealed, and not enforced by martial law. We have seen no occasion for three years past of such a law as is now supposed necessary. If the resistance be small, said a member from North Carolina, the magistrates will be competent to the business; if great, it would not be prudent to attempt to crush it. It is not necessary to make laws merely because the Constitution authorizes a dangerous power.

H. or R.]

The Militia Bill.

Mr. MURRAY said, he was opposed to the last motion, as well as to that from the gentleman from New York. He offered several remarks to show the necessity of providing for an energetic execution of the laws, while at the same time he was fully impressed with the importance of having the power defined and guarded as much as possible. He adverted to the British Government, where a prompt and energetic execution of the law is considered of the first importance, while at the same time the military is never called in but in the last extremity. He gave a short account of the proceedings of that Government in the insurrection raised in the city of London by Lord George Gordon, &c.

Mr. CLARK was in favor of striking out. He said the motion from the gentleman of New York, went to call forth the military in case of any opposition to the excise law; so that if an old woman was to strike an excise officer with a broomstick, forsooth the military is to be called out to suppress an insurrection. The Government, he observed, was in its infancy, and he saw no necessity for supposing that the people would at this early stage oppose the laws.

Mr. BENSON rose to explain. He said, his ideas were misconceived, he had no such designs as were imputed to him; his wish was to provide in the simplest and best manner for the object contemplated in the bill.

Mr. GERRY said he was opposed to striking out the section, but still was not pleased with it altogether, and moved an amendment.

Mr. MERCER said, he had not heard any proposition which pleased him; he liked the section as it stood better than any of them, but thought that it required some essential alteration or addition; he had no idea that this Government was to depend on the several State Governments for carrying its laws into execution. He then adverted to the two different powers in a community, the civil and military; the first is a deliberative power, the other cannot deliberate; and therefore in no free country can the latter be called forth, nor martial law proclaimed but under great restrictions. He observed, that the General Government had respect to the persons of the citizens of the several States, and not to the Government of those States; on this principle the marshals of the several States have a power to call forth the posse comitatus; and additional marshals should be appointed, and only in the last extremity they may call forth the military power; he was in favor on the whole of retaining the section, and concluded by reading a clause which he proposed should be inserted as an additional section.

Mr. SENY was in favor of retaining the clause, but he thought it ought to be qualified by some explanatory article.

Mr. PAGE. Suppose the case should happen in which the militia should refuse to act, regulars must then be called in—a fair pretext for a military establishment. Treason has existed in every country, and has been punished with the approbation of good men; and should a combination too powerful take place, and application be made for assistance, let Congress make laws to provide for such cases in future. It should be remembered that the doctrine now contended for is that very doctrine which dismembered the British Empire. Sir, it would have been happy for Britain if this doctrine had never been taught in that Kingdom: Soldiers, not militia, must be the proper tools for the Government that wishes to enforce its laws by arms. But do the virtuous, patient, submissive, and truly patriotic citizens of the United States deserve the suspicion which is excited against them, and stigmatizes them in the clause which I move to strike out?

Such bills in a free State, where the people have been taught to look upon the right of refusing submission to unconstitutional acts, may excite insurrections much easier than quell them.

The motion for striking out was negatived.

Mr. STEELE moved to amend the section by striking out the clause which authorizes the President of the United States to call out the militia of one State to suppress insurrections in another. He enforced this motion by saying that he hoped it would always be found that there were a sufficient number of persons within every State well affected to the laws to suppress any opposition to them within the State.

Mr. MURRAY replied to Mr. STEELE. He said that the gentleman's observations went to deprive the people of one of the most obvious benefits arising from the social compact. He said he should be much obliged to the gentleman if he would point out any other remedy for the case contemplated, than that proposed; for his own part, he knew of none.

Mr. GILES observed, that the exigency contemplated by the section was of so great magnitude, that of the opposition of a whole State to the laws of the Union, that it required a more competent provision than was provided by this bill. He was fully impressed with the propriety of the Government's possessing a power to execute its laws, and to provide for its own security; still he considered that the case to be provided for could not happen suddenly, and therefore he thought the power now under consideration could not with safety be intrusted to the President of the United States; he was therefore in favor of striking out the clause.

Mr. GERRY supported the clause; he denied that it involved the consequences deduced by the gentlemen opposed to it. It does not suppose a State to be in rebellion; such a supposition cannot be supported, when it is considered that in order to a State's being considered in that light, a Legislative act must precede and accompany a declaration of the fact. He adverted to facts to show the necessity for the provision. He had no objection to qualifying the clause by directing the marshals in the first instance to apply to the Executives of the several States.

Mr. BALDWIN was opposed to the clause, and in favor of striking out. He adverted to the Constitution to show that it was not contemplated thereby that this power should be slightly delegated to the Executive, and agreeable to this idea

The Militia Bill.

[H. or R.]

the first Congress had dealt out this power with a sparing hand.

The motion for striking out the clause was negatived.

Mr. STEELE moved to add a clause providing for the intervening of a session of Congress previous to the marching of the militia of one State into another; this, after some debate, was negatived.

An amendment was then moved by Mr. MADISON to modify the section, so as to delegate this power to the President of the United States during the recess of Congress.

Mr. BENSON observed, that with respect to the object, State lines were perfectly ideal; that an inhabitant of one State was equally bound with that of another to march to suppress insurrections, and to assist in execution of the laws as much as the inhabitants of a State in which the opposition to the laws existed.

The motion of Mr. MADISON was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN moved an amendment to the second section, providing that information of any insurrection shall be communicated to the President of the United States by one of the Associate Justices, or the District Judge; which was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER proposed an additional section providing for the issuing a Proclamation by the President of the United States, and for the reading of such Proclamation in the hearing of the insurgents, previous to using a military force; which was agreed to.

Section 3d.—Mr. MERCER moved to add after the words "articles of war," in the 10th line, except that they shall not be subject to corporal punishment; this, after some debate, was negatived.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by this House, to the bill entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments, and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part. They have passed the bill entitled "An act to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, for a certain bond entered into by him during the late war," with several amendments; and a bill entitled "An act to compensate the services of the late Colonel George Gibson," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. HARTLEY, from the committee appointed to inquire into the present state of the recruiting service, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, April 24.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene for a certain bond entered into by him during the late war; and the same being twice read, were agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates; was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GERRY, from the committee to whom was referred a motion for obtaining an impartial publication of the debates of the House of Representatives, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On a motion made and seconded, Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses on the 5th day of May next, to close the present sessions, and to meet again on such day as may by law be directed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress; and that Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. BENSON, and Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, be the said committee. The House proceeded to consider the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Robert Neil. Whereupon, Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner, praying relief against the determination of the Auditor and Comptroller of the Treasury, on a claim which he has exhibited against the United States, cannot be granted.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress; which was received, read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making certain appropriations therein specified; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the remission of certain duties; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and agreed to several amendments thereto; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

An engrossed bill to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress was read the third time and passed.

WEDNESDAY, April 25.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Charles Colvill and William Robertson, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE MILITIA BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House yesterday, to the bill to provide for calling forth the Militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

The second section of the bill, for calling forth the Militia, being under consideration—

Mr. GOONAU observed that the amendment appeared to him to require some amendment; for an insurrection may happen in a remote part of the Union, and all the mischief completed before this proclamation could reach the spot.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed that the proclamation could reach the scene of action as soon as the order from the President for calling forth the Militia could; therefore, the objection applies to other parts of the bill.

Mr. MERCER supported the amendment on precedent, and by arguments drawn from facts and experience.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected, generally, to any amendment of the bill. He doubted whether the Legislature of the United States had a right to authorize the President to call forth the Militia till some real necessity for the measure should exist.

Mr. CLARK inquired whether the United States have a right to call on the justices of the peace to execute the laws of Congress; if they have no such right, the amendment, so far as it respects those officers, is nugatory.

Mr. WAITE was in favor of the clause generally, but said he had no idea that the General Government had any right to call on the officers of the particular States to execute the laws of the Union.

Mr. GERRY, advertent to several parts of the Constitution, observed, that nothing could be plainer than this—that the General Government had a right to require the assistance of the officers of the several State Governments; for they have severally taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KIRKLAND opposed the amendment. He thought the tendency of it, so far from operating to suppress insurrections, would produce them in a much greater degree. He objected particularly to that part of the clause which required the proclamation's being read in the hearing of the insurgents. He believed it was true that no advantage had ever, in fact, resulted from the practice. It was then voted to strike out the latter part of the amendment, which respects calling on the justices of the peace or the judges to read the proclamation.

And then the said bill, together with the amendments, were ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, authorizing the President of the Senate and SPEAKER of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses on the 5th day of May next, to close their present sessions, and to meet again on such day as may by law be directed.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate on Monday last, desiring a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said conference, and that Mr. CLARK, Mr. WAITE, and Mr. MURRAY, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House, on the 16th instant, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for regulating proceedings in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," and made some progress therein, when an adjournment was called for. Whereupon, the several orders of the day were further postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 26.

An engrossed bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Lewis Garanger, in behalf of himself and his brother, Charles Garanger, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Charles Colvill and William Robertson. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said report be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned.

Mr. LEE, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on sundry petitions, praying the renewal of certificates which have been lost or destroyed, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the 16th instant, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating proceedings in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," and the same being further amended, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendments thereto, be read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the 13th instant, on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to alterations in the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying duties in their stead; and, also, upon spirits dis-titled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," and the said resolutions being twice read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. MACON, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill authorizing a grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to confirm an award or report of referees between the United States and Comfort Sands, and others; and that Mr. BENSON, Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, and Mr. GRIFFIN, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for registering ships or vessels, and for regulating those employed in the coasting trade and fisheries; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for reducing the rates of postage on newspapers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 27.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," with the amendments, was taken up, on its third reading; when

Mr. MERCER moved to recommit the bill, in order to restoring an amendment disagreed to in the House, which had passed unanimously in the Committee of the Whole. This amendment was, to strike out the clause that authorizes the creditor to pursue his action till a tender of the debt and costs in gold or silver is made. This motion was founded on the particular circumstances of persons indebted to foreigners. It was said that the law, with this clause in it, would annihilate the power of the several States to pass insolvent laws; and, in consequence, those unfortunate debtors would be entirely in the power of a set of persons who retained the most rancorous enmity against the Revolution, and the persons most conspicuous in their exertions to bring about that event. It was further said, that it vests a power in a merciless creditor to immure an unfortunate debtor within the walls of a prison for life. It confounds the unfortunate with the vicious and abandoned, and extends a regulation designed originally merely to produce a full discovery and delivery of all the debtor's property, to a most unrighteous and unreasonable punishment, to the shortening of life, and to the injuring of society. It was further observed, that its operation would place the citizens of the United States upon a very different footing from English debtors who owe money to the citizens of the United States. The Treaty of Peace which had been mentioned, was concluded during the existence of those laws under which the British debtors enjoyed privileges which will by no means be reciprocal, should this clause be retained. It was also observed, that if this law was passed, it would not be in the power of the Legislature to provide a remedy, as it would be an ex post facto law; it would place the debtors in a much worse situation than they were in at the time the contracts were made—by giving these foreign creditors an advantage which they did not contemplate at the time when the credit was given.

In opposition to the motion, for recommitting the bill, it was contended that the creditors alluded to had not discovered that rancorous and cruel disposition, in at least some of the States, which had been complained of; but, on the contrary, had treated their debtors in the most humane and generous manner. The provision contemplated by the bill is precisely the same with that contained in a law which has twice received the sanction of Congress under the new Constitution, of which no complaint had ever been made; that to prescribe a different rule, would excite great alarms, and be attended with embarrassments, and perhaps with injury to the debtor as well as to the creditor. To leave it optional with the debtor to say in what manner he will pay his debts, or to subject the creditor to the caprice of the several State Governments whose laws may be founded on very opposite principles, will put it out of his power to get his debts paid agreeably to the Treaty of Peace, and therefore will be a virtual infraction of that treaty. The provision, it was said, is strictly conformable to the letter of the Constitution. Uniformity, in connexion with justice, was a principal object contemplated by the Constitution. This was considered as one of its chief excellencies; but, to say that foreign creditors shall be subjected to the Legislative provisions of the several States, which are known to clash, some of which have made paper a tender, others of which have depreciated paper in circulation, is, to defeat every just expectation founded on the Treaty of Peace and the Constitution. It was urged that this clause ought to be retained on every principle of uniformity as a general provision. Nor could it be considered as an ex post facto law, since every contract would remain as it was, and always be determined according to its own principles; except by mutual consent, this general provision should be resorted to.

The question was then taken on recommitting the bill, and it was ordered to be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made a farther amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to.

The said bill, together with the amendments thereto, was again read; and on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

An engrossed bill authorizing a grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for reducing the rates of postage on newspapers, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to confirm an award of referees between the United States and certain contractors for furnishing supplies of provision to the Army, during the late war; which was received and read twice and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." They also recede from their amendments, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States." And they have passed the bill, entitled "An act for raising a farther sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States; which was received, read twice and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "for raising a farther sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned;" and the same being read, were amended and agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

The several orders of the day were further postponed until to-morrow.

SATURDAY, April 28.

Mr. AMES, from the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of Marine Hospitals, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by this House to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for raising a farther sum of money for the protection of the Frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned." They have also resolved that the bill, entitled "An act for reducing the rates of postage on newspapers" do not pass to a second reading.

MONDAY, April 30.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his reports on two petitions of Richard Blackledge; also, on the petition of Joseph Henderson and Alexander Contee Hanson; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill relative to the compensations to certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendments, do lie on the table.

DUTIES ON SPIRITS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House on Saturday last, to the bill concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States; and the same being read, some were agreed to, and others disagreed to.

Mr. STEELE moved to strike out eight cents and insert six, upon the first class of spirits distilled from fruit or grain within the United States. This motion, he said, had failed in Committee, but upon reflection the House might probably express a different opinion, and with that hope he was induced to renew the motion. When a proposition has for its basis justice as well as policy, it cannot lose advocates by consideration, and several days having elapsed since the former discussion, a well grounded assurance is entertained that the present attempt will not be wholly unsuccessful. The object of the Excise law originally was supposed to be revenue. The objects of the present bill is to remove objections, and, if possible, render that mode of taxation more palatable to the community. If therefore it can be proved that neither of these desired ends can be attained without reducing the duty, common sense suggests the propriety of doing it. The manner in which this law is now executed has disgracefully committed the dignity of the General Government, and a sense of national honor requires that one of two things should be done; either that the law be totally repealed, or fully executed. If the latter be the determination of the Government, it cannot be productive without reducing the rate simplifying its operations, and, in many respects, rendering it less exceptionable to the people. It has been enacted now near twelve months, and in that time it cannot be said to have been well executed in all, or productive in any part of the United States, in the degree which was originally expected.

The Secretary of the Treasury has proposed, in his report, that in certain instances the proprietors of stills should be allowed to discharge the amount of their respective duties in the produce of the distilleries. This, sir, will be an accommodation to the distillers, but while it answers this beneficial purpose to them, it operates as a strong argument in favor of a reduction of the duties. If reasonably reduced, an indulgence so unfavorably to the public would not be demanded or expected. The present motion is made under a conviction (resulting from a considerable knowledge of the nature of grain distilleries, and of the circumstances of the country where they are most in use) that the Treasury will receive more money from a duty of six than nine cents upon the gallon.

Mr. STEELE then begged the House to recollect that this is the first attempt to introduce a system of excise into the United States; that it is too the first attempt to tax any article of American growth or manufacture; that the law requires a surrender of at least one-fourth part of the value of the thing excised, and that not only the justice of the measure is denied, but its policy is doubted. The necessities of the Government are so interwoven at this time with its policy, that it is not easy for this or any other measure relating to revenue, to undergo the proper consideration, or to be decided simply upon its merits. The opposition to this law has not proceeded from a restless and disorderly spirit among the people, but from an aversion which freemen in all countries ever had, and perhaps ever will have to this mode of taxation. And let ingenious theorists refine as they please upon the nature of indirect taxes, it must always be admitted that excises retrench the liberty of the citizens on whom they operate, and that they are subject to solid, as well as plausible objections. It has already been the subject of much complaint in many parts of the Union, and will be productive of serious consequences if these complaints be not redressed by the Legislature, in the present session. Among the causes of dissatisfaction are the following: 1st. Excise laws are novel in the United States, and odious in their nature; 2d. Articles of American manufacture are not proper objects of taxation, and if they were, the rate of duty in this instance is too high; 3d. The proportion which was established between the rate of duties on molasses, rum, and spirits distilled from fruit and grain, tends to the encouragement of the former, at the expense and depression of the latter; 4th. Because it operates, and is in fact, a tax upon this occupation and agriculture, as they stand connected in one part of the Union, while manufactures in other parts are not only rewarded by high protecting duties, but in some instances even by specified bounties.

The agricultural interest has experienced the unfavorable influence of this law likewise, and it operates most oppressively too upon that class of farmers whose estates are situated in the interior country, and whose interests have thus far passed almost unnoticed, in the policy of the General Government. That class of citizens, though they have not been most solicitous, are nevertheless not insensible of their burdens, and the neglect with which their interest has been treated.

The value of our lands has been stationary for some time; its produce not in demand, and where it is, at depreciated prices; and notwithstanding this, taxes are imposed, evidently calculated in their operation to render agriculture tributary to the more favored branches of business.

No argument can be advanced that will justify the imposition of burdens upon the cultivation of the soil, for the aggrandizement of manufactures, or the emolument of those concerned in them.

Mr. STEELE then said, he would put a case, which is a familiar one in the State which he represents, and might be so in others. If a farmer is possessed of a given quantity of rye for sale, money cannot be obtained for it at any price—he sends it to a distillery, where one-half is given in the first instance for manufacturing the other. The duty is then to be paid out of the farmer's part, which reduces the balance to less than one-third of the original quantity. If this is not an oppressive tax, I am at a loss to describe what is so; and if a proposition had been made to lay a similar tax upon American porter, nails, paper, shoes, or any other article of this kind, we should not shortly have heard the last of it. And here let me ask, what is in the nature of these manufactures which entitles them to such priorities and preferences? It may fairly be answered, that they are nearer to perfection, that they are aided by more capital, that they are therefore better able to bear taxation, and that the advantages which they now enjoy have been derived from the generosity of members representing the agricultural parts of the country. It is most sincerely to be wished that the manufacturing States would fix some bounds to their expectations, and that they will not continue to insist upon unreasonable sacrifices from those who are engaged in different pursuits, and little able to make them.

The tendency of this law has been, and, if not differently modified, will continue to be, to build up the rum distilleries upon the ruins of those employed by farmers for domestic uses. These are not suggested to be the motives which actuated any part of the majority in passing this law originally, or which now influence the zealous opposition to the present motion; but as the reduction of the tax is objected to principally by gentlemen, who on other occasions have been anxious to afford Legislative aid to American manufactures, it is not uncharitable to say that their singular conduct now might justify such an imputation.

Duties on Spirits.

If this has not been the policy, my motion for the proposed reduction will indubitably prevail. Mr. STEELE then called the attention of the House to the system of Federal taxation in general, and instanced several duties which operate unfavorably to the landed interest in the Southern parts of the Union. Particularly the high duty on salt, nails, shoes, and other essential articles in husbandry, with which the people of those States are almost wholly supplied from foreign markets. The enhanced price of salt and nails are seriously complained of in those States, because the one is essential to the improvement of their large stocks of cattle; and the article of nails is in very extensive use because the country is improving in buildings, and yet to be improved. The tax upon these articles cannot be felt in an equal degree in the Northern and Eastern States for very obvious reasons.

It has been frequently asserted in the course of this debate, that distilleries in the Eastern States have flourished and are growing up under the operation of this law, which, if true, is an unsolvable argument in proof of its inequality. In the Southern States they are cramped, in many instances annihilated; and the Secretary, sensible of this, has, in his report, proposed a temporary expedient of allowing the distillers the privilege of discharging the duties on the spirits distilled at certain stipulated prices. This is plainly admitting the truth of an assertion which has often been repeated, that the law, in its operation, would be found unequal and oppressive.

In order to vote understandingly on the present question, we ought to have been furnished from the Treasury, with a statement of the net amount of revenue accruing from molasses distillation, after deducting the drawbacks upon the molasses distilled and the rum exported. This, compared with the amount accruing from the distillation of American produce, on which a drawback is seldom demanded, would be placing the subject in a proper point of view for a satisfactory decision. The statement should now be called for, if the late hour of the session did not render it impracticable. A gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AVES.] in the course of his remarks, has stated that the existing proportion is sufficiently favorable to the distilleries employed in grain and fruit. For that the American-made rum now pays, including the duty on molasses, thirteen cents per gallon, while its rival liquor, of common quality, is only subject to nine cents. This is true, as it relates to the consumers within the United States, and if none was exported, might be less excepted; but how does it operate upon the American distillers? One in Massachusetts makes a certain quantity of rum for exportation; it is exported, and of course pays no duty; while another, in North Carolina, makes an equal quantity of spirits, from fruit and grain, wholly for home consumption, and stands chargeable for the full amount of the duties. But admitting them both to be articles of American manufacture, and alike entitled to Legislative protection, is there any color of justice in taxing rum, which, by the estimation of the gentlemen themselves, is worth in the market at least two-thirds of a dollar per gallon, only ten cents, when you propose to tax spirits made from grain, which is worth in the market but half as much, eight cents? The inequality is so glaring that if the motion is decided on principle it must succeed; and if it does, there is good reason to believe that the people will be disposed to give the law a fair experiment, even in places where it has been hitherto least palatable.

This, sir, may not improperly be termed a struggle between two classes of citizens whose interests are, and will be for some years, dissimilar—the agricultural and manufacturing parts of the United States. It is not the first conflict of the kind, and may not, perhaps, be the last; and, if we may judge from experience, it will not be difficult to predict how it will terminate.

However, while facts and principles are in favor of the motion, we shall be justified in contending for what we have not heretofore had, "constitutional equality, and impartial legislation."

It may once for all be remarked, without expecting it will have any influence on the House, that a great majority of my constituents hold in detestation the name as well as the nature of an Excise law; and that they would have been among the first to remonstrate, if they had not been fully sensible that their Representatives would speak their sentiments and describe their feelings whenever a proper occasion should occur.

This is deemed to be that proper occasion; these are their sentiments, delivered in the language of sincerity; and if they are disregarded, the members from that State have discharged their duty, and will not be answerable for the consequences. But it has been said by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FITZSIMONS.] that if the duty be reduced to six cents, agreeably to my motion, it will not be worth collecting. To this it may be plainly answered, that if the duty be not reduced, it cannot, nor will not be collected.

The question was then taken that the House do agree to the amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole for filling up the blank for the amount of duty "on every gallon of spirits of the first class of proof, distilled within the United States from materials of the growth or produce of the United States," with "eight cents," and it passed in the negative—yeas 26, nays 27, as follows:

Sumpter, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.
Resolved, That the said blank be filled up with the words "seven cents."
Ordered, That the farther consideration of the said bill be postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, May 1.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House yesterday to the bill relative to the compensation of certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage; and, the same being read, were agreed to; and then the said bill, being further amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the remission of certain duties; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.
Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

On a motion made and seconded,
Resolved, That a joint committee of both Houses be directed to wait on the President of the United States, to request that he would recommend to the people of the United States a day of public humiliation and prayer to be observed, by supplicating Almighty God for the safety, peace, and welfare of these States.

Ordered, That Mr. BODINOT, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. SYLVESTER, be appointed of the said joint committee on the part of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt;" and, the same being amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be now read the third time.

The said bill, with the amendments, was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to the further consideration of the bill concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States; and, the same being further amended, was, together with the said amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to authorize the remission of certain duties was read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to confirm an award of referees between the United States and certain contractors for furnishing supplies of provisions to the Army during the late war; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read and agreed to by the House.
Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendment, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petitions of the Commissioners of Loans of New Hampshire and Rhode Island; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, May 2.

An engrossed bill concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee, jointly, with such committee as this House shall appoint, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

An engrossed bill to confirm an award of referees between the United States and certain contractors for furnishing supplies of provisions to the Army during the late war was read the third time; and, on the question that the said bill do pass, it passed in the negative—yeas 25, nays 27, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, John Brown, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, William B. And so the bill was rejected.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the "bill supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States;" and, after some spent therein, the Committee rose, reported and progressed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to authorize the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House. They also agree to some and disagree to others of the amendments proposed by this House to the bill which originated in the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt;" and they agree to some and disagree to others of the amendments proposed by this House to the bill which originated in the Senate entitled "An act regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have resolved that the bill sent from this House entitled "An act to authorize the remission of certain duties" do not pass to the third reading.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the conference proposed by this House on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations to the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part. The Senate have also passed a bill entitled "An act to continue in force the act therein mentioned, and to make further provision for the payment of pensions to invalids;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

FRIDAY, May 4.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act to continue in force the act therein mentioned, and to make provision for the payment of pensions to invalids;" was read three times and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the protection of the river and bay fisheries; which was received and read the first time.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Brown Cutting: Whereupon,

Resolved, That, in consideration of certain expenditures on behalf of the United States, made by John Brown Cutting, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, there be advanced and paid to the said John Brown Cutting the sum of two thousand dollars, out of any money not otherwise appropriated; and that the Secretary of State be authorized to inquire into the entire claim of the said John Brown Cutting against the United States; and, upon receipt of the proofs and exhibits in support thereof, to ascertain what sum shall thereupon appear to be due to or from him, in account with the United States, including the advance hereby directed, and to report the same to the next session of Congress.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. GOODHUE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for settling the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the claim of John Brown Cutting against the United States; which was received, and read twice and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of War on the petition of Richard Henly Courts; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the resolution of the twenty-fourth ultimo authorizing the President of the Senate and SPEAKER of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 5th of May be repealed; and that, instead thereof, they be authorized to adjourn their respective Houses on Thursday, the 10th of May instant, to meet again on such day as shall by law be appointed.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from further proceeding on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petitions of the Commissioners of Loans of New Hampshire and Rhode Island; and that Mr. BOURNE, of Rhode Island, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. ASHE, be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to provide for the payment of the hire of clerks, and for stationery in the offices of the several Commissioners of Loans.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally read and agreed to.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. They also agree to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act to continue in force the act therein mentioned, and to make further provision for the payment of pensions to invalids." The Senate have also passed the bill entitled "An act relative to the compensations to the officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. They have also agreed to the resolution of this House respecting the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, with an amendment; to which they also desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the resolution last mentioned; and, the same being read, was agreed to, as follows: Strike out "Thursday, the 10th instant," and insert "Tuesday, the 8th instant."

SATURDAY, May 5.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled

"An act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States;" and the same being twice read, was agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act relative to the compensations to the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imposts and tonnage; and the same being twice read, were agreed to.

Mr. MADISON, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors, and witnesses," reported that the managers had met the managers on the part of the Senate, in the conference chamber, and fully discussed the subject referred to them, and had agreed that it would be proper, on the part of this House, to recede from the fourth amendment to the third section, as also from the second amendment to the fourth section; but that, on the subject-matter of all the other amendments, the managers of the two Houses had not come to any agreement. Ordered, That the consideration of the said report be postponed until Monday next.

An engrossed bill for settling the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass—it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 23, as follows:

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The bill supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States, was further discussed.

A motion was made and seconded further to amend the said bill by inserting, after the third section, the following clause, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That a farther loan, to the amount of ——— dollars, be proposed, and subscriptions thereto be received, at the same times and places, and by the same persons, as hereinbefore mentioned, and that the sums which shall be subscribed to the said loan, shall be payable in the debts of the States hereinafter mentioned, and in the proportions following."

H. or R.]

The Public Debt.

[May, 1792.]

Mr. Genay observed, that when this question was last under consideration, he had followed gentlemen who were opposed to it in their arguments through the extensive field of the constitutionality, policy, and equity of the measure, and that he now should confine himself to the statement of some facts and a few observations thereon.

It appears by official reports, that the unassumed debts of the several States, are as follows:

Of New Hampshire	$42,501
Massachusetts	1,838,540
Rhode Island	349,259
Connecticut	313,766
New York	23,878
New Jersey	7,351
Virginia	225,126
South Carolina	1,965,756
Georgia	400,000
Total	5,166,177

It also appears that the following fictitious debts have been assumed, viz:

For Pennsylvania	$1,024,898
Delaware	146,694
Maryland	70,774
North Carolina	20,452
Total	1,262,818

From this statement it is manifest, that whilst several of the States are exonerated of the debts contracted for the support of the war, and others have but a small proportion of them unassumed, the States of South Carolina and Massachusetts are pressed with a heavy debt of nearly two millions of dollars each. This is a grievance that requires immediate redress, and should Congress rise without providing it, they would forfeit that confidence in their generosity, honor, and justice, which had been ever entertained by the citizens of Massachusetts. No gentleman, could deny, that the exertions of that State in support of the Independence of the United States, had equalled those of any other State in the Union; the documents would prove that Massachusetts had not been exceeded by any of her sister States in the amount of her advances, or in the economy of her expenditures; and her exertions to sink the debt, which commenced with the debt itself, were finally so great as to have produced convulsions in the State.

The unassumed debt of that State, from the best information which he could obtain, was in the hands of the substantial yeomanry thereof, who, having never speculated in the funds, were original holders. Most of these, either by art, or by accident, had been misinformed relative to the time for receiving subscriptions to the loan, and had thus been prevented from having a part of their debts assumed. It will be, therefore, peculiarly hard, whilst Congress are calling on this class of citizens for their proportion of contributions to pay the debts due to others, that no provision is made for the payment of their just demand; and the case is aggravated, when it is considered that their contributions are not confined to real, but are extended to fictitious debts, and that whilst they are unjustly required to pay interest on the latter, their just claims are rejected for interest on the former. It is still more grievous, when it is considered that whilst Government refuse to reimburse the sums advanced by Massachusetts for the defence of her sister States, ten or fifteen years past, she is called on for large sums to defend their frontiers against savage incursions. What must be the feelings of the citizens of Massachusetts, when they are informed, that Pennsylvania, whose frontiers are now invaded, and who is receiving the interest of an imaginary debt of about a million of dollars, is calling on them for supplies to carry on the war, and at the same time refuses to discharge their advances for her defence, during the late war? Indeed, some of the members of this State have been always liberal on the question of assumption, and have uniformly supported it, but others have opposed it, and the votes of the former have been rendered ineffectual by those of the latter. Under such circumstances, would not the members of South Carolina and Massachusetts have been justified in refusing aids for support of the Indian war, and in defeating this measure, by joining in the opposition to it? Would they not have been warranted in thus compelling Pennsylvania to have defended herself by her own resources, and to have exhibited her claims for supporting this war, to be adjusted with those of other States for supporting the Revolution? True it is, that in such an event, many of the innocent citizens of the Western frontiers would have fallen a sacrifice, and some of their own Representatives would have been chargeable for the consequence; but so far were the members of South Carolina, Massachusetts, and other creditor States, from adopting such policy, that they have advocated the measures for defending the Western frontiers, and are now to be sent home in disgrace to their constituents, for having spent a great part of the session in pursuing measures to promote the welfare of those States, who have had no disposition to do justice to the creditor States. Could he have foreseen such an event, he would not have taken his seat in the House this session; but he still hoped, as it was well known and ascertained beyond a doubt, that Massachusetts would have a claim against the United States, far exceeding the sum proposed to be assumed for her, that the House would consider the subject in a candid manner; that the members would divest themselves of local considerations, and that they would adopt measures consistent with liberality and justice. Indeed, it was for the interest even of the debtor States to assume the debts, because when the accounts are liquidated, the debts due to the creditor States will not be due from the Union, but from the debtor States; and if the Union is to be taxed for those debts, the creditor States will be obliged to contribute to the reimbursement of advances, which they have made for the other States. This cannot be done consistently with justice, and will therefore be a source of great uneasiness and embarrassment to Government: whereas, if the debts of the citizens of the States are now assumed, and the claims of the States are thus diminished, the cause of the embarrassment will in a great measure be prevented. He hoped, therefore, the motion would be adopted, and that the residue of the State debts would be now assumed.

The previous question was then demanded by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question to agree to the said motion be now put?" And on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"—It passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 35, as follows:

And so the said motion was lost.

The said bill was then further amended, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next. A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have deferred, until the next session of Congress, the consideration of the bill sent from this House, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States." The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," to which they desire the concurrence of this House. They have appointed a committee jointly, with such committee as this House shall appoint, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

MONDAY, May 7.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States was read the third time.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," was read twice, and committed.

Mr. Bourne, of Rhode Island, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for making compensations to the Commissioners of Loans for extraordinary expenses; which was received and read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

Ordered, That Mr. Seney, Mr. Gilman, and

Mr. Grove, be appointed a committee on the part of this House jointly with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill concerning the claim of John Brown Cutting against the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

An engrossed bill for making compensations to the Commissioners of Loans for extraordinary expenses, was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said bill, together with the amendments thereto, was then read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill concerning the claim of John Brown Cutting against the United States, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 22, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Shearjashub Bourne, John Brown, William B. Giles, Benjamin Goodhue, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, Nathaniel Macon, Andrew Moore, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Peter Sylvester, George Thatcher, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Artemas Ward, Alexander White, and Hugh Williamson.

Mr. Seney, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly, with the committee of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress, reported that the committee had performed that duty.

Mr. Lee, from the committee to whom was recommended the report on the memorials of Joseph Ceracchi, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"It appears to your committee, that Mr. Ceracchi is an artist of great reputation in Europe, a gentleman of respectable character, and has been actuated by the most honorable motives in offering to dedicate his genius and labors in the service to the United States. It appears, however, to your committee, that, at the present time, it might not be expedient to go into the expenses which the monument voted by Congress on the 7th day of August, 1783, would require, especially with the additional ornaments proposed by the artist."

The House proceeded to consider the report of the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses." Whereupon, the second amendment to the second section, for striking out the words following:

"And be at liberty to pursue the same until a tender of the debt and costs in gold or silver shall be made," being read, and the question put that this House do adhere to the said amendment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 17, as follows:

N^{AY}S.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Sherrishub Bourne, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Jas. Hillhouse, Amasa Learned, William Vans Murray, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Peter Sylvester, and Artemas Ward.

Resolved, That this House doth adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the fourth section proposed to be added to the said bill, and doth recede from all the other amendments disagreed to by the Senate.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act for making compensations to the Commissioners of Loans for extraordinary expenses;" and also the bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

The said bill was then amended; and, together with the amendments, ordered to be now read the third time.

The said bill, with the amendments, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain appropriations therein specified; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and the same being twice read, was agreed to.

TUESDAY, May 8.

An engrossed bill making certain appropriations therein specified, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment to which this House hath adhered, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to compensate the services of the late Colonel George Gibson;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The said bill was then read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his Report on the petition of Simon W. Wilson; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GROVE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of North Carolina, made a report; which was read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of North Carolina, praying that Congress would authorize the Legislature of that State to impose a duty of tonnage, for deepening the channel across the Swash and Bar in Pamlico Sound and Croatan, report:

"That the Legislatures of the States of Rhode Island, Maryland, and Georgia, have severally passed laws for removing obstructions or deepening rivers or harbors, to which laws the United States in Congress have given their assent: wherefore, the committee are of the opinion, that when the Legislature of the State of North Carolina shall have passed a law imposing a duty of tonnage for the improvement of their navigation, it may be proper for Congress to consider whether such law shall have the proposed operation."

On a motion made and seconded.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House, as early in the next session as may be practicable, the number and capacity of the stills in the respective districts and States, the net product of revenue of the respective districts and States, particularizing the drawbacks, and distinguishing foreign from American materials, and the product paid by the gallon, month, or year; also, the number of officers and the amount of their salaries.

On motion,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be provided for the use of the several Collectors in the United States, printed clearances, on the back whereof shall be a printed account of the methods which have been found to answer for obtaining fresh from salt water, and of constructing ex tempore stills, of such implements as are generally on board every vessel, with a recommendation, in all cases where they shall have occasion to resort to this expedient for obtaining water, to publish the result of their trial in some gazette, on their return to the United States, or to communicate it for publication to the office of the Secretary of State, in order that others may, by their success, be encouraged to make similar trials, and be benefited by any improvements or new ideas which may occur to them in practice.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill respecting the government of the Territories of the United States, Northwest and South of the river Ohio; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, made a report; which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House will, early in the next session, proceed to take the said report into consideration.

An engrossed bill respecting the government of the Territories of the United States Northwest and South of the river Ohio was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate agree to the resolution of this House, directing printed clearances of a particular form, to be furnished to the several Collectors in the United States. They have passed the bill, entitled "An act making certain appropriations therein specified," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment; and the same being twice read, was agreed to.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do procure such of the statutes of the several States as may not be in his office; and that the expense thereof be defrayed out of the money that is, or may by law be appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of this House.

A message was received from the Senate, notifying the House that the Senate, having completed the Legislative business before them, are now about to adjourn. Whereupon, Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are now about to adjourn until the first Monday in November next, and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message; and, being returned,

The SPEAKER adjourned the House, to meet on the first Monday in November next.

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 5, 1792.

MONDAY, November 5, 1792.

This being the day fixed by law for the annual meeting of the second session of the second Congress, the following Senators appeared, and took their seats:

JOHN LANGDON and PAINE WINGATE, from New Hampshire;

CALEB STRONG and GEORGE CABOT, from Massachusetts;

THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island;

GEORGE READ, from Delaware;

JAMES MONROE, from Virginia;

JOHN BROWN and JOHN EDWARDS, from Kentucky;

BENJAMIN HAWKINS, from North Carolina;

PIERCE BUTLER and RALPH IZARD, from South Carolina; and WILLIAM FEY, from Georgia.

In the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, and also of RICHARD HENRY LEE, elected President pro tempore at a former session, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and JOHN LANGDON was duly elected.

JOHN BROWN and JOHN EDWARDS, from the State of Kentucky, respectively, produced their credentials; and the oath required by law was, by the PRESIDENT pro tempore, administered to them.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed on business.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

A second message informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have resolved that a committee be appointed, jointly with such committee as the Senate shall appoint, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may please to make to them; in which resolution they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, agreeably to the resolution of the House of Representatives, and that Messrs. IZARD and STRONG be the committee on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution; and Resolved, That they do concur therein, and that the Right Rev. Bishop WHITE be the Chaplain on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have proceeded to the election of a Chaplain to Congress for the present session, and have appointed the Rev. Doctor GREEN on their part.

Mr. IZARD, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, agreeably to the resolution of the two Houses of this day, reported,

That they had executed the business, and that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES proposed to meet the two Houses of Congress in the Senate Chamber to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, November 6.

ROBERT MORRIS, from the State of Pennsylvania, attended, and took his seat.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate are ready to meet them in the Senate Chamber, to receive any communications the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES may be pleased to make to the two Houses of Congress, and that the usual seats will be assigned to them.

The House of Representatives having accordingly taken their seats, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES came into the Senate Chamber, and addressed both Houses of Congress, as follows:

SENATE.]

Proceedings.

[NOVEMBER, 1792.]

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

It is some statement of the satisfaction with which I meet you on the present occasion, that, in felicitating you on a continuance of the national prosperity, generally, I am not able to add to it information that the Indian hostilities, which have, for some time past, distressed our northwestern frontier, have terminated.

You will, I am persuaded, learn with no less concern than I communicate it, that reiterated endeavors, towards effecting a pacification, have hitherto issued only in new and outrageous proofs of persevering hostility on the part of the tribes with whom we are in contest. An earnest desire to procure tranquility to the frontier; to stop the further effusion of blood; to arrest the progress of expense; to forward the prevalent wish of the nation for peace, has led to strenuous efforts, through various channels, to accomplish these desirable purposes: in making which efforts, I consulted less my own anticipations of the event, or the struggles which some considerations were calculated to inspire, than the wish to find the object attainable; or, if not attainable, to ascertain unequivocally that such is the case.

A detail of the measures which have been pursued, and of their consequences, which will be laid before you, while it will confirm to you the want of success, thus far, will, I trust, evince that means as proper and as efficacious as could have been devised have been employed. The issue of some of them, indeed, is still depending; but a favorable one, though not to be despised, is not promised by any thing that has yet happened.

In the course of the attempts which have been made, some valuable citizens have fallen victims to their zeal for the public service. A sanction commonly respected even among savages has been found, in this instance, insufficient to protect from massacre the emissaries of peace: it will, I presume, be duly considered whether the occasion does not call for an exercise of liberality towards the families of the deceased.

It must add to your concern to be informed, that, besides the continuation of hostile appearances among the tribes north of the Ohio, some threatening symptoms have of late been revived among some of those south of it.

A part of the Cherokees, known by the name of Chickamagas, inhabiting five villages on the Tennessee river, have long been in the practice of committing depredations on the neighboring settlements.

It was hoped that the treaty of Holston, made with the Cherokee nation in July, 1791, would have prevented a repetition of such depredations. But the event has not answered this hope. The Chickamagas, aided by some banditti of another tribe, in their vicinity, have recently perpetrated wanton and unprovoked hostilities upon the citizens of the United States in that quarter. The information which has been received on this subject will be laid before you. Hitherto, defensive precautions only have been strictly enjoined and observed. It is not understood that any breach of treaty, or aggression whatsoever, on the part of the United States, or their citizens, is even alleged as a pretext for the spirit of hostility in this quarter.

I have reason to believe that every practicable exertion has been made (pursuant to the provision by law for that purpose) to be prepared for the alternative of a prosecution of the war, in the event of a failure of pacific overtures. A large proportion of the troops authorized to be raised have been recruited, though the number is still incomplete. And pains have been taken to discipline and put them in condition for the particular kind of service to be performed. A delay of operations (besides being dictated by the measures which were pursuing towards a pacific termination of the war) has been in itself deemed preferable to immature efforts. A statement, from the proper Department, with regard to the number of troops raised, and some other particulars which have been suggested, will afford more precise information, as a guide to the Legislative consultations; and, among other things, will enable Congress to judge whether some additional stimulus to the recruiting service may not be advisable.

In looking forward to the future expense of the operations which may be found inevitable, I derive consolation from the information I receive, that the product of the revenues for the present year is likely to supercede the necessity of additional burdens on the community for the service of the ensuing year. This, however, will be better ascertained in the course of the session; and it is proper to add, that the information alluded to proceeds upon the supposition of no material extension of the spirit of hostility.

I cannot dismiss the subject of Indian affairs without again recommending to your consideration the expediency of more adequate provision for giving energy to the laws throughout our interior frontier, and for restraining the commission of outrages upon the Indians; without which all pacific plans must prove nugatory. To enable, by competent rewards, the employment of qualified and trusty persons to reside among them as agents, would also contribute to the preservation of peace and good neighborhood. If, in addition to these expedients, an eligible plan could be devised for promoting civilization among the friendly tribes, and for carrying on trade with them, upon a scale equal to their wants, and under regulations calculated to protect them from imposition and extortion, its influence in cementing their interest with ours, could not but be considerable.

The prosperous state of our revenue has been intimated. This would be still more the case were it not for the impediments which, in some places, continue to embarrass the collection of the duties on spirits distilled within the United States. These impediments have lessened, and are lessening, in local extent; and, as applied to the community at large, the contentment with the law appears to be progressive.

But symptoms of increased opposition having lately manifested themselves in certain quarters, I judged a special interposition on my part proper and advisable; and, under this impression, have issued a Proclamation, warning against all unlawful combinations and proceedings, having for their object or tending to obstruct the law in question, and announcing that all lawful ways and means would be strictly put in execution for bringing to justice the infractors thereof, and securing obedience thereto.

Measures have also been taken for the prosecution of offenders; and Congress may be assured that nothing within constitutional and legal limits, which may depend upon me, shall be wanting to assert and maintain the just authority of the laws. In fulfilling this trust, I shall count entirely upon the full co-operation of the other Departments of the Government, and upon the zealous support of all good citizens.

I cannot forbear to bring again into the view of the Legislature the subject of a revision of the Judiciary system. A representation from the Judges of the Supreme Court, which will be laid before you, points out some of the inconveniences that are experienced. In

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I entertain a strong hope that the state of our national finances is now sufficiently matured to enable you to enter upon a systematic and effectual arrangement for the regular redemption and discharge of the Public Debt, according to the right which has been reserved to the Government; no measure can be more desirable, whether viewed with an eye to its intrinsic importance, or to the general sentiment and wish of the nation.

Provision is likewise requisite for the reimbursement of the loan which has been made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which it is incorporated; in fulfilling the public stipulations in this particular, it is expected a valuable saving will be made.

Appropriations for the current service of the ensuing year, and for such extraordinary services as may require provision, will demand, and I doubt not will engage, your early attention.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I content myself with recalling your attention, generally, to such objects, not particularized in my present, as have been suggested in my former communications to you.

Various temporary laws will expire during the present session. Among these, that which regulates trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes will merit particular attention.

The results of your common deliberations hitherto, will, I trust, be productive of solid and durable advantages to our constituents; such as, by conciliating more and more their ultimate suffrage, will tend to strengthen and confirm their attachment to that constitution of Government upon which, under Divine Providence, materially depend their union, their safety, and their happiness.

Still further to promote and secure these inestimable ends, there is nothing which can have a more powerful tendency, than the careful cultivation of harmony, combined with a due regard to stability in the public councils.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 6, 1792.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES having retired, and the two Houses being separated, Ordered, That Messrs. STRONG, KING, and RUTHERFORD, be a committee to prepare and report the draft of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech this day, to both Houses of Congress convened in the Senate Chamber.

Ordered, That the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, delivered this day, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The petition of a number of the merchants of the city of Charleston was presented and read, praying that a law may be passed, restraining and altering the proceedings, and reducing the fees of the Court of Admiralty.

Ordered, That this petition lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Secretary furnish the members of the Senate, from such printers as they may respectively direct, each, three newspapers, to be left from time to time, during the session, at their several places of abode.

WEDNESDAY, November 7.

The President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, with his accounts made up to the 30th of September, 1792; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.
The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In pursuance of the law, I now lay before you a statement of the administration of the funds appropriated to certain foreign purposes, together with a Letter from the Secretary of State, explaining the same.

I also lay before you a copy of a Letter and representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the difficulties and inconveniences which attend the discharge of their duties, according to the present Judiciary system.

A copy of a Letter from the Judges attending the Circuit Court of the United States for the North Carolina district, in June last, containing their observations on an act passed during the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions;" and

A copy of the Constitution formed for the State of Kentucky.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 7, 1792.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.
Mr. Strong, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported an Address to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; which was read.

Ordered, That to-morrow be assigned to take this report into consideration.

The President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of War, on the subject of Indian affairs, with sundry papers therein mentioned.

The Letter was read, and the papers were in part read; and, after progress, the further reading thereof was postponed.

THURSDAY, November 8.

JOHN HENRY, from the State of Maryland, attended, and took his seat.

The President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of War, communicating the information of a Treaty of Peace having been recently concluded by General Putnam between the United States and certain tribes of Western Indians, together with sundry papers; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the Address reported by the committee to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; which, being recommitted and amendments reported, was agreed to, as amended.

Ordered.

That the same committee wait on the President of the United States, and desire him to acquaint the Senate at what time and place it will be most convenient for him that it should be presented.

Mr. Strong, from the above-mentioned committee, reported that the President of the United States proposed to receive the Address of the Senate at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The reading of the papers communicated on the 7th of November, from the Secretary of War, was resumed, and, after progress, postponed.

FRIDAY, November 9.

The Senate waited on the President of the United States at his own house, and the President pro tempore, in their name, communicated him the Address agreed to on the 8th instant, which is as follows:

To the President of the United States:

Accept, sir, our grateful acknowledgments for your Address at the opening of the present session. We participate with you in the satisfaction arising from the continuance of the general prosperity of the nation, but it is not without the most sincere concern that we are informed that the reiterated efforts which have been made to establish peace with the hostile Indians, have hitherto failed to accomplish that desired object. Hoping that the measures still depending may prove more successful than those which have preceded them, we shall nevertheless concur in every necessary preparation for the alternative; and, should the Indians on either side of the Ohio persist in their hostilities, fidelity to the Union, as well as affection to our fellow-citizens on the frontiers, will insure our decided co-operation in every measure which shall be deemed requisite for their protection and safety.

At the same time that we avow the obligation of the Government to afford its protection to every part of the Union, we cannot refrain from expressing our regret that even a small portion of our fellow-citizens in any quarter of it should have combined to oppose the operation of the law for the collection of duties on spirits distilled within the United States; a law repeatedly sanctioned by the authority of the nation, and, at this juncture, materially connected with the safety and protection of those who oppose it. Should the means already adopted fail in securing obedience to this law, such further measures as may be thought necessary to carry the same into complete operation cannot fail to receive the approbation of the Legislature, and the support of every patriotic citizen.

It yields us particular pleasure to learn, that the productiveness of the revenue of the present year will probably supercede the necessity of any additional tax for the service of the next.

The organization of the government of the State of Kentucky being an event peculiarly interesting to a part of our fellow-citizens, and conducive to the general order, affords us particular satisfaction.

We are happy to learn that the high state of our credit abroad has been evinced by the terms on which the new loans have been negotiated.

In the course of the session we shall proceed to take into consideration the several objects which you have been pleased to recommend to our attention; and, keeping in view the importance of union and stability in the public councils, we shall labor to render our decisions conducive to the safety and happiness of our country.

We repeat with pleasure our assurances of confidence in your Administration, and our ardent wish that your unabated zeal for the public good may be rewarded by the durable prosperity of the nation, and every ingredient of personal happiness.

JOHN LANGDON,

President pro tempore.

To this Address, the President of the UNITED STATES was pleased to make the following reply:

I derive much pleasure, gentlemen, from your very satisfactory Address. The renewed assurances of your confidence in my Administration, and the expression of your wish for my personal happiness, claim and receive my particular acknowledgments. In my future endeavor for the public welfare, to which my duty may call me, I shall not cease to count upon the firm, enlightened, and patriotic support of the Senate.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Senate returned to their Chamber.

The Senate proceeded to class the Senators from the State of Kentucky, as the Constitution requires, when numbers two and three being by the Secretary, rolled up and put into the ballot-box, Mr. Brown drew number two, and is accordingly of the class whose seats will be vacated in 1791. Mr. Edwards drew number three, and is accordingly of the class whose seats in Senate will be vacated at the expiration of four years from March, 1791.

Ordered, That Messrs. RUTHERFORD, SHERMAN, and WINGATE, be a committee to report a bill, authorizing the settlement of the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States.

The following Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I now lay before you a Letter from the Secretary of State, covering the copy of one from the Governor of Virginia, with the several papers therein referred to, on the subject of the boundary between that State and the Territory of the United States south of the Ohio. It will remain with the Legislature to take such measures as it shall think best, for settling the said boundary with that State, and, at the same time, if it thinks proper, for extending the settlement to the State of Kentucky, between which and the same Territory the boundary is as yet undetermined.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 9, 1792.

[DECEMBER, 1792.]

These, and a Letter of the 9th of October last, which has been already communicated to you, from the same Department to the Governor, will show in what manner the first session of the act of the last session, which provides for calling out the Militia for the repelling of Indian invasions, has been executed. It remains to be considered by Congress whether, in the present situation of the United States, it be advisable or not to pursue any further or other measures than those which have been already adopted. The nature of the subject does, of itself, call for your immediate attention to it; and I must add, that, upon the result of your deliberations, the future conduct of the Executive will on this occasion materially depend.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 7, 1792.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Agreeably to the notification of the 5th instant, Mr. BRADLEY obtained leave to bring in "a bill in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled 'An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" and the bill was read the first time, and ordered to pass to the second reading.

MONDAY, December 10.

The Senate proceeded to the second reading of the bill in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States," and, after debate, Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, STRONG, KING, ELLSWORTH, and BROWN, to consider generally, and report thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of War, on the subject of Indian affairs, with sundry papers enclosed; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 11.

Mr. BUTLER, from the committee appointed to take into consideration the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," reported amendments.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the last mentioned bill; and, on motion, to expunge the following proviso in the first section of the bill, to wit:

"Provided, That they shall not continue to enjoy the same longer than they shall continue to be wholly owned, and to be commanded, by a citizen or citizens of the said States."

It passed in the negative—yeas 5, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. BROWN, Butler, Edwards, Few, and Izard.
NAYS.—Messrs. Bassett, Bradley, Cabot, Dickinson, Ellsworth, Foster, Hawkins, Henry, Johnston, King, Langdon, Monroe, Morris, Read, Robinson, Sherman, Stanton, Strong, and Wingate.

And, after agreeing to sundry amendments, as reported by the committee,

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

JOHN TAYLOR, appointed by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, in the place of RICHARD H. LEE, resigned, produced his credentials and took his seat in the Senate. He also produced the credentials of his appointment to a seat in the Senate for six years from the 4th of March, 1793; which were severally read, and the oath was, by the VICE PRESIDENT, administered to Mr. TAYLOR, as the law provides.

According to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded to the third reading of the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," and, after agreeing to further amendments,

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

THURSDAY, December 13.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee appointed to take into consideration the bill in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States," reported amendments, which were adopted, and the bill was amended accordingly.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

FRIDAY, December 14.

Mr. BRADLEY reported from the committee to whom was referred the petition of James Mathers, and the report was adopted. Whereupon, Ordered, That James Mathers be authorized to employ a person for the purpose mentioned in his petition, and that the person thus employed be allowed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum not exceeding fifty cents per day during the session of the Senate, to be paid out of the money appropriated for the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress.

The bill in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass; that the title thereof be "An act in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled 'An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" that it be engrossed, and that the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

MONDAY, December 17.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee, made April the 5th, 1792, on the subject of Weights and Measures, together with the motion made thereon the 6th instant.

A motion was made to postpone the consideration thereof, and to

A motion was made and seconded that the Senate adopt the following resolutions, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States are individually responsible for their conduct to their constituents, who are entitled to such information as will enable them to form a just estimate thereof.

"Resolved, That the Journals are too voluminous and expensive to circulate generally; and, if it were otherwise, that the information they contain, as to the principles, motives, and designs of individual members, is inadequate.

"Resolved, That this information, defective as it is, becomes more nugatory and delusive, in proportion as the occasion for it increases, since the Senate make their own Journals.

"Resolved, That the conducting of the Legislative and Judicial powers of the Senate in public, and suffering an account of their measures and deliberations to be published in the newspapers, is the best means of diffusing general information concerning the principles, motives, and conduct of individual members; and that, by withholding this information, responsibility becomes unavailing, the influence of their constituents over one branch of the Legislature, in a great measure, annihilated, and the best security which experience has devised against the abuse of power and a mal-administration abandoned.

"Resolved, therefore, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open whilst the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judicial capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule shall commence and be in force on the first day of the next session of Congress.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate request the Commissioners of the city and county of Philadelphia to cause a proper gallery to be erected for the accommodation of an audience.

MONDAY, January 26.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Since my last communication to you, on the subject of the revenue on distilled spirits, it has been found necessary, on experience, to revise and amend the arrangements relative thereto, in regard to certain surveys, and the officers thereof, in the district of North Carolina; which I have done accordingly, in the manner following:

1st. The several counties of the said district originally and heretofore contained within the first, second, and third surveys, have been allotted into, and are now contained in, two surveys; one of which (to be hereafter denominated the first) comprehends the town of Wilmington, and the counties of Onslow, New Hanover, Brunswick, Robertson, Sampson, Craven, Jones, Lenox, Glascow, Johnston, and Wayne; and the other of which (to be hereafter denominated the second) comprehends the counties of Currituck, Camden, Pasquotank, Perquimans, Chowan, Gates, Hartford, Tyrrel, Bertie, Carteret, Hyde, Beaufort, and Pitt.

2dly. The several counties of the said district originally and heretofore contained within the fifth survey of the district aforesaid, has been allotted into and is contained in two surveys, one of which (to be hereafter denominated the third) comprehends the counties of Mecklenburg, Rowan, Iredell, Montgomery, Guilford, Rockingham, Stokes, and Surry; and the other of which (to be hereafter denominated the fifth) comprehends the counties of Lincoln, Rutherford, Burke, Buncombe, and Wilkes.

3dly. The duties of inspector of the revenue, in and for the third survey, as constituted above, is to be performed, for the present, by the supervisor.

4thly. The compensations of the inspector of the revenue for the first survey, as above constituted, are to be a salary of two hundred and fifty dollars per annum, and commissions and other emoluments similar to those heretofore allowed to the inspector of the late first survey, as it was originally constituted.

5thly. The compensations of the inspector of the revenue for the second survey, as above constituted, are to be a salary of one hundred dollars per annum, and commissions and other emoluments heretofore allowed to the inspector of the late third survey, as it was originally constituted.

6thly. The compensations of the inspector of the revenue for the fifth survey, as above constituted, are to be a salary of one hundred and twenty dollars per annum, and the commissions and other emoluments, similar to those heretofore allowed to the inspector of the late fifth survey, as it was originally constituted.

RICHARD PORTIS, from the State of Maryland, appointed in place of CHARLES CARROLL, resigned, produced his credentials, and took his seat.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded to consider the motion made the 3d of January, 1793, "That the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open whilst the Senate shall be sitting in their Legislative and Judiciary capacity."

On motion for the previous question, to wit: Shall the question be now put on the following preliminary resolutions?

Resolved, That the Senate of the States are, individually, responsible for their conduct to their constituents, who are entitled to such information as will enable them to form a just estimate thereof.

Resolved, That the journals are too voluminous and expensive to circulate generally; and, if it were otherwise, that the information they contain, as to the principles, motives, and designs, of individual members, is inadequate.

Resolved, That this information, defective as it is, becomes more nugatory and delusive, in proportion as the occasion for it increases, since the Senate make their own journals:

Resolved, That the conducting of the Legislative and Judicial powers of the Senate in public, and suffering an account of their measures and deliberations to be published in the newspapers, is the best means of diffusing general information concerning the principles, motives, and conduct, of individual members; and that, by withholding this information, responsibility becomes unavailing; the influence of their constituents over one branch of the Legislature in a great measure annihilated, and the best security which experience has devised against the abuse of power and a mal-administration abandoned:

It passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gunn, Monroe, Potts, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bassett, Bradley, Brown, Cabot, Dickinson, Ellsworth, Foster, Hawkins, Henry, Johnston, Izard, King, Langdon, Morris, Read, Robinson, Rutherford, Stanton, Sherman, Strong, and Wingate.

And on motion to agree to the main question, to wit:

Resolved, therefore, That it be a standing rule, that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open whilst the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judiciary capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule shall commence and be in force on the first day of the next session of Congress.

It passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gunn, Hawkins, King, Monroe, Potts, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bassett, Bradley, Cabot, Dickinson, Ellsworth, Foster, Henry, Johnston, Izard, Langdon, Morris, Read, Robinson, Rutherford, Sherman, Stanton, Strong, and Wingate.

On the question to agree to the last resolution moved for on this subject, it passed in the negative.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the committee appointed to take into consideration the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services during the late war," reported a state of facts. Whereupon, the Senate resumed the second reading of the bill reported on, and, having agreed to an amendment, Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

The second reading of the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to authorize a loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States," was resumed.

SENATE.]
On motion to agree to the first section of the bill, to wit:
"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, after the accounts between the United States and the individual States shall be finally settled, and the balances placed on the books of the Treasury, pursuant to the act entitled, 'An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States,' a loan, to the amount of the balances which, upon such settlement, shall be found due to particular States, including interest thereon to the end of the present year, shall be opened at the loan offices within such States, respectively, to the extent, in each State, of the balance which shall be found due to the same, to commence on the 1st day of January, 1794, and to continue open for the term of six months, and no longer: Provided, That no such loan shall be opened in any State without the assent of the Legislature thereof."

It passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 17, as follows:
YEAS.—Messrs. Cabot, Dickinson, Ellsworth, Foster, Izard, King, Morris, Rutherford, Sherman, Stanton, and Strong.
NAYS.—Messrs. Bassett, Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gunn, Hawkins, Henry, Johnston, Langdon, Monroe, Potts, Read, Robinson, Taylor, and Wingate.

On motion to agree to the subsequent sections of the bill, it passed in the negative.
On the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate do not concur in passing this bill.

TUESDAY, February 5.

Mr. KING reported, from the managers on the part of the Senate, at the conference on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions:"

"That, on conferring with the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, the managers on the part of the House agreed to recommend to the House, to recede from their disagreement to the last amendment proposed by the Senate, but, that the managers from the two Houses did not agree to any report respecting the amendment proposed by the Senate to the 4th section of the bill.

"Whereupon, the managers on the part of this House recommended that the Senate do recede from their amendment to the 4th section, so far as respects the words proposed to be inserted in lieu of the words proposed to be expunged; and that they do insist on their amendment, so far as respects the striking out of the words proposed to be struck out in the said 4th section. "And that the Senate do also insist on their last amendment."

And the report was agreed to.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I now lay before you a report and plat of the Territory of the United States on the Potomac, as given in by the Commissioners of that Territory, together with a Letter from the Secretary of State, which accompanied them. These papers being original, are to be again deposited with the records of the Department of State, after having answered the purpose of your information.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 18, 1793.

Ordered, That this Message lie on the table.

The petition of John Fisk and others, in behalf of the Marine Society of Salem, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, was presented and read, praying that a light-house may be constructed at the North end of Baker's island, near Salem, within the State aforesaid; and that due provision may be made, at the expense of the United States, for maintaining and supporting the same.

Ordered, That this petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of Samuel Stearns, praying compensation as a physician to certain invalid officers during the late war; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SATURDAY, March 2.

The PRESIDENT notified the Senate that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES proposes to take the oath of office on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, in the Senate Chamber.

Ordered, That this communication be referred to the committee appointed on the part of the Senate the 6th of February last, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act making certain appropriations therein mentioned," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. The President of the United States hath notified the House of Representatives, that he hath approved and signed "An act making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio."

Proceedings.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of Simeon Thayer," was read the third time.

On motion to postpone the consideration of this bill to the next session of Congress, it passed in the negative.

On motion to concur in this bill as amended, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bassett, Burr, Dickinson, Edwards, Few, Foster, Gunn, Henry, Johnston, Izard, Monroe, Morris, Potts, Read, Rutherford, Stanton, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Butler, Cabot, Ellsworth, Hawkins, King, and Sherman.

Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendment.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of $9,768 90," reported that the committee be discharged; and the report was agreed to.

Ordered, That the petition of James Warrington, on which the bill last mentioned was originated, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed till the next session of Congress.

A motion was made and seconded, to propose to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States, to wit:

"Article 1, section 8, after the words 'general welfare of the United States,' add, 'in the cases herein-after particularly enumerated.' And at the end of the section, add, 'but no power to grant any charter of incorporation, or any commercial or other monopoly, shall be hereby implied.'"

"Section 9. Every tax shall be deemed direct, other than taxes on imports, excises, transfers of property, and law proceedings.' At the end of the section, add, 'no member of Congress shall be eligible to any office of profit under the authority of the United States, nor shall any person intrusted with the management of money of the United States, or concerned in the direction or management of any bank or other moneyed corporation within the United States, be capable of a seat in either House of Congress.'"

"Article 3, section 1. After the words 'ordain and establish,' add, 'or in such of the State courts as the Congress shall deem fit.'"

Ordered, That these propositions lie on the table.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence entitled "An act making certain appropriations therein mentioned" was read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, read the second and third times and passed.

Mr. KING, from the committee appointed this day on the communication of the President of the UNITED STATES relative to his taking the oath of office, reported that the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the President of the UNITED STATES will, on Monday next take the oath of office required by the Constitution, in the Senate Chamber, at 12 o'clock; and that he inform the President of the UNITED STATES that the Senate will be in session at that time. And the report was adopted.

The Senators of the State of Georgia, in pursuance of a law of the said State, executed a deed of cession to the United States of the light-house on Tybee Island; which was ordered to lie on file.

Mr. FOSTER reported, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence entitled "An act to refund to Jacob Bell certain duties on pickled fish."

Resolved, That this bill do not pass.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have passed a bill entitled "An act making addition to the compensation of certain public officers;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

On motion that the consideration of this bill be postponed to the next session of Congress, it passed in the negative.

It was agreed, by unanimous consent, that this bill be now read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence entitled "An act to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis," reported an amendment; which was disagreed to.

On motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill to the next session of Congress, it passed in the negative.

On motion that this bill pass to the third reading, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Simeon Thayer;" they have postponed the consideration of the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act providing for the compensation of Ebenezer Storer" to the next session of Congress.

Mr. GUNN, from the managers at the conference on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," reported that, having conferred with the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, they could not come to any agreement.

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have adjourned until 7 o'clock this evening.

On motion to recede from the amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Simeon Thayer," it passed in the affirmative.

The petition of Barent I. Staats was read, stating that he advanced money to one of the Quartermasters of the late Army, to enable him to compensate certain teamsters employed in the public service, and for which advance he has not been reimbursed, but is excluded therefrom by the acts of limitation, and praying relief.

Ordered, That this petition lie on the table.

SATURDAY EVENING, 7 o'clock.

The memorial of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives was read, stating that, from the enhanced prices of all the necessities of life, their respective stipends are become inadequate, and praying further compensation.

Ordered, That this memorial lie on the table.

Ordered, That the petition of the French settlers at Gallipolis be referred to the Attorney General, to examine and report to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, upon the validity of their claims to lands under purchases of the Ohio or Scioto Companies, or other persons; together with his opinion of the means proper to be pursued by them for the obtaining of justice.

Ordered, That the Secretary return all original papers not addressed to the Senate, which have been laid before them during the present session by the President or by any of the Heads of Departments.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the Legislative business before them, are ready to adjourn.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed a committee, jointly with a committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn without day, unless he may have any further communications to make; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate, and the appointment of a committee on their part.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the foregoing resolution, and that Messrs. JOHNSTON and RUTHERFORD be the joint committee on their part.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

Mr. JOHNSTON reported, from the joint committee last mentioned, that they had waited on the President of the UNITED STATES, who informed the committee that he had no further communications to make to Congress at this time.

Whereupon, the Senate then adjourned without day.

SPECIAL SESSION.

MONDAY, March 4.

In conformity to the summons from the President of the UNITED STATES, the Senate assembled in the Senate Chamber.

The Hon. JOHN LANGDON, President pro tempore, read the summons of the President of the UNITED STATES, as follows:

The President of the United States to the President of the Senate:

Certain matters, touching the public good, requiring that the Senate shall be convened on Monday, the 4th instant, I have desired their attendance, as I do yours, by these presents, at the Senate Chamber, in Philadelphia, on that day; then and there to receive and deliberate on such communications as shall be made to you on my part.

G. WASHINGTON.

MARCH 1, 1793.

The following Senators were present:

JOHN LANGDON, from New Hampshire;
GEORGE CABOT, from Massachusetts;
THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island;
OLIVER ELLSWORTH, and ROGER SHERMAN, from Connecticut;
RUFUS KING, from New York;
JOHN RUTHERFORD, from New Jersey;
ROBERT MORRIS, from Pennsylvania;
GEORGE READ, from Delaware;
JOHN HENRY and RICHARD POTTS, from Maryland;
JAMES MONROE, from Virginia;
JOHN BROWN and JOHN EDWARDS, from Kentucky;
BENJAMIN HAWKINS, from North Carolina;
RALPH IZARD, from South Carolina;
JAMES GUNN, from Georgia.

SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from the State of New Hampshire, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the Senate; and the oath was administered to him by the President of the Senate, as the law provides.

Agreeably to notice given by the President of the UNITED STATES, on the 2d instant, he came to the Senate Chamber, and took his seat in the Chair usually assigned the President of the Senate, who, on this occasion, was seated at the right and in advance of the President of the UNITED STATES; a seat on the left, and also in advance, being provided for Judge CUSHING, appointed to administer the Oath; the doors of the Senate Chamber being open, the Heads of the Departments, Foreign Ministers, the late Speaker, and such Members of the late House of Representatives as were in town, together with as many other spectators as could be accommodated, were present.

After a short pause, the President of the Senate arose, and addressed the President of the UNITED STATES, as follows:

"SIR: One of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States is now present, and ready to administer to you the oath required by the Constitution to be taken by the President of the UNITED STATES."

SENATE.]

Inauguration.

[MARCH, 1793.]

On which the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, rising from his seat, was pleased to address the audience as follows:

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: I am again called upon, by the voice of my country, to execute the functions of its Chief Magistrate. When the occasion proper for it shall arrive, I shall endeavor to express the high sense I entertain of this distinguished honor, and of the confidence which has been reposed in me by the people of United America.

"Previous to the execution of any official act of the President, the Constitution requires an oath of office. This oath I am now about to take, and in your presence; that, if it shall be found, during my administration of the Government, I have, in any instance, violated, willingly or knowingly, the injunction thereof, I may (besides incurring Constitutional punishment) be subject to the upbraidings of all who are now witnesses of the present solemn ceremony."

Judge CUSHING then administered the oath of office required by the Constitution; after which, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES retired, and the spectators dispersed.

After acting upon several nominations received from the PRESIDENT, the Senate adjourned, sine die.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 5, 1792.

MONDAY, November 5, 1792.

This being the day appointed by law for the meeting of the present Congress, the following members appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats:

From New Hampshire, NICHOLAS GILMAN, SAMUEL LIVERMORE, and JEREMIAH SMITH.

From Massachusetts, FISHER AMES, SHEARJASHUB BOURNE, ELBRIDGE GERRY, BENJAMIN GOODHUE, GEORGE THATCHER, and ARTEMAS WARD.

From Rhode Island, GEORGE LEONARD, BENJAMIN BOURNE.

From Connecticut, AMASA LEARNED, JONATHAN STURGES, and JONATHAN TRUMBULL, (Speaker.)

From Vermont, NATHANIEL NILES and ISRAEL SMITH.

From New York, EGBERT BENSON, JOHN LARRANCE, and THOMAS TREDWELL.

From New Jersey, ELIAS BOUDINOT, ABRAHAM CLARK, and JONATHAN DAYTON.

From Pennsylvania, THOMAS FITZSIMONS and FREDERICK AUGUSTUS MUELLENBERG.

From Maryland, PHILIP KEY and WILLIAM VANS MURRAY.

From Virginia, WILLIAM B. GILES, JAMES MADISON, ANDREW MOORE, JOSIAH PARKER, ABRAHAM VENABLE, and ALEXANDER WHITE.

From North Carolina, NATHANIEL MACON, JOHN STEELE, and HUGH WILLIAMSON.

From South Carolina, WILLIAM SMITH, THOMAS SUMPTER, and THOMAS TUDOR TUCKER.

From Georgia, ABRAHAM BALDWIN and FRANCIS WILLIS.

A quorum of members being present, a message was sent to the Senate to inform that body thereof. And a similar message was received by the House from the Senate; and that JOHN LANGDON had been chosen their President pro tempore.

A joint committee were then appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may think proper to make them.

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

The House then proceeded to appoint a Chaplain on their part, when a majority of votes appeared in favor of the Reverend ASHBEL GREEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Georgia, enclosing a proclamation and return of the election of JOHN MILLEDGE, to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, in the room of ANTHONY WAYNE, whose seat was declared vacant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of sundry merchants of the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will pass a law to restrain the proceedings, and reduce the fees in the Court of Admiralty of the United States in the said State; as, also, to admit of other security being taken, to the satisfaction of the Judge of the Court, in small and trivial causes brought by seamen or others against vessels in the merchants' service.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. WHITE, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them, reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the PRESIDENT was pleased to say, that he would make a communication to both Houses of Congress to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, in the Senate Chamber.

TUESDAY, November 6.

Several other members, viz: from New York, JAMES GORDON; from Pennsylvania, JOHN WILKES KITTERA; and from Virginia, SAMUEL GRIFFIN and JOHN PAGE, appeared and took their seats in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate are now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to attend this House in receiving the communication from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, agreeably to his notification to both Houses yesterday.

The SPEAKER, attended by the members of this House, then withdrew to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate; and, being returned, the SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the Speech delivered Defeat of General St. Clair—Answer to the President.

by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress, in the Senate Chamber. [A copy of the Speech appears in the proceedings of the Senate.]

Ordered, That the said Speech be committed to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY November 7.

Several members, to wit: from New York CORNELIUS C. SCHOONMAKER; from New Jersey, AARON KITCHELL; from Pennsylvania, DANIEL HEISTER; and from Virginia, RICHARD BLAND LEE, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his accounts of the receipts and expenditures of the public moneys, from the 1st of January, 1792, to the 30th of September following, inclusive; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from Mr. Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, enclosing several accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the public money. Ordered to be printed (100 copies) for the use of the members.

Mr. GOODHUE moved for a committee, to bring in a bill for registering ships and vessels, and regulating those employed in the coasting trade.

Ordered, That Messrs. GOODHUE, FITZSIMONS, and PARKER, be the committee.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial from Joseph Barnes, attorney for James Rumsey, praying the House to take up his former petition, respecting the enacting another law for the encouragement of Useful Arts, and complaining that the law now in force is altogether insufficient for the purpose of securing authors and inventors of machinery, &c., from the piracy and frauds of pretending impostors. Read and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, communicating to the House sundry documents referred to by him in his Address to both Houses yesterday, viz: a statement of the appropriation of the funds, certified by the proper officers. A representation from the Chief Justice and associate Justices of the Courts of the United States, complaining of the great severity of the duties imposed on them in being obliged to attend the Circuit Courts, which occasioned them to spend a large portion of their lives in the act of traveling, which ought not to be expected from men far advanced in years, unless in cases of great necessity. That they were almost constantly forced to be absent from their families, and their health daily impaired by the fatigue and burden of their office. And praying that a modification may speedily take place in the Judiciary system.

Another memorial was also amongst the papers sent with the PRESIDENT'S Message, from the Judges of the North Carolina district, containing a detail of the inconveniences to which they were subjected by the law respecting the claims of widows, orphans, and invalid pensioners. Both of those communications request that Congress may hasten a modification of the Judiciary system of the United States, which, in some instances, they affirm, to be not only burdensome and unnecessarily severe, but absolutely impossible in the execution.

The next document was the Constitution of the State of Kentucky.

The Clerk of the House proceeded to read some of the above-mentioned papers; and finished that respecting the appropriation of the funds, as ordered by law, in the Department of State. These were what had been communicated to the PRESIDENT by Mr. JEFFERSON, and contained details of moneys paid to the persons employed at Foreign Courts, &c., up to the 3d of November, 1792, amounting, in the whole to $143,500. These sums have been paid principally to Colonel Humphreys, at Portugal; Mr. Gouverneur Morris, at Paris; Mr. Short, at the Hague; Mr. Carmichael, at Madrid; &c. Mr. Secretary JEFFERSON'S communication further contains an analysis of the expenses of the Department of State, from the 1st of July, 1790, to the 1st of July, 1791, and from thence to the 1st of July, 1792. During the former period the amount was $21,054 61. The latter is about 23,000. These papers were referred to a committee, and then the House proceeded to the other parts of the PRESIDENT'S Message, some of which being of a confidential nature, the galleries were ordered to be cleared.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

Ordered, That the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, which was made on the 8th day of May last, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

Mr. STEELE, at this early hour of the present session, called the attention of the House to the report which had been brought in at the close of the last session, by the committee then appointed to inquire into and report on the causes of the defeat of the troops under the command of Major General St. Clair, on the 4th of November, 1791. Several reports having been circulated, reflecting dishonorably upon the conduct of that committee, of which Mr. S. was a member, rendered it necessary for him to require a speedy consideration of the whole subject, in order to do away the prejudices which had probably taken place in the minds of many of the citizens of the United States. For these reasons, he moved that the said report should be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That it be taken up on this day week.

ANSWER TO THE PRESIDENT.

The order of the day being called for, Mr. LAURANCE (in the Chair,) the Speech of the PRESIDENT, delivered yesterday to Congress, was taken up; and, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, the following resolve was agreed to: "That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a respectful Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech delivered to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the present session; with assurances, that they would take into consideration the important matters therein contained." An amendment was now moved, to strike out the word "important;" but it was negatived, as being a word of too much importance to be neglected. The resolution was carried, in substance, as above, and the Committee rose and reported it. The House immediately agreed, and a committee of three—Messrs. MADISON, BENSON, and MURRAY—were appointed by the SPEAKER to prepare the answer in conformity with the said resolve.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you copies of certain papers relative to the Spanish interference in the execution of the treaty entered into in the year 1790, between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, together with a Letter from the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, on the same subject.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 7, 1792.

The papers accompanying the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two Letters from Thomas Barclay, Consul of the United States at the Court of Morocco, one dated the 28th of May, the other the 17th of July, 1792, enclosing petitions from Richard O'Brien, in behalf of himself and other citizens of the United States, now in captivity at Algiers, stating the peculiar hardships they have undergone during the time they have been kept in slavery, and praying that Congress will consider their distressed situation, and take such measures for their release, as to their wisdom shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said letters and petitions be referred to the Secretary of State, for information.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the following papers, to wit:

"1st. A statement of the measures taken, and the overtures made, to procure a peace with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio."

"2d. Information received relatively to the pacific overtures and the disposition of the Indians Northwest of the Ohio."

"3d. A statement of the measures which have been taken to conciliate and quiet the Southern Indians."

"4th. Information received relatively to the disposition of the Southern Indians, and the causes of the hostilities of part of the Cherokees and Creeks."

"5th. A statement of the troops in the service of the United States."

The said Letter and statements were partially read.

THURSDAY, November 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Connecticut, JAMES HILLHOUSE; from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM FINLEY and ISRAEL JACOBS; and from Kentucky, ALEXANDER D. ORR, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The petition of James Warrington, attorney in fact of Joseph Blachford, surviving partner of Harris & Blachford, late of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, was presented, praying that the sum of seven thousand and fifty-two dollars and eighty-three-ninetieths of a dollar, with the interest thereon, which is due from the United States to the estate of John Banks, deceased, may be applied to the discharge of a claim of the petitioner's constituents against the estate of the late General Greene, on account of his security to them in behalf of the said Banks, on a contract to supply the late Southern Army with provisions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial from Messrs. Joseph and Woodrop Sims, merchants in Philadelphia was read, declaring that the ship Two Brothers, with a cargo of salt, wines, &c., bound from Cadiz to Philadelphia, had been, some time ago, driven into New York by stress of weather; that they had directed their agent there (Mr. Seaton) to dispose of the cargo, but, on being afterwards informed that it would not bring prime cost, they countermanded their orders, and the ship was coming round to Philadelphia without having broke bulk, but was wrecked off Egg Harbor; that the duties had been bonded at New York when the ship entered there, and the Collector had informed them he could not relinquish his demand for the whole of said duties; that there was no part of the property saved except five casks and one quarter-cask of wine, and some part of the rigging; that said five and a quarter casks were duly gauged and the duty paid in Philadelphia; and, finally, praying to be relieved from the payment of the duties secured at New York on a cargo which never came into their possession—this either by a general or special law of Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, brought in a report from the committee appointed on the representation of the merchants of Charleston, against the law for regulating the fees in the Court of Admiralty of the United States, &c.; that it was the opinion of the committee that said law should be repealed, and another act passed to regulate said fees and to empower the Judges to take bail in trivial cases brought by seamen in the merchants' service, not exceeding five hundred dollars; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Barnes, attorney in fact for James Rumsey, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. STROGES, and Mr. LEE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, communicating information that, on the 12th of September last, Brigadier General Putnam concluded a Treaty of Peace, on behalf of the United States, with the Wabash and Illinois Indians, consisting of the several tribes of Eel River, Ouittanonah, Potawatamies of the Illinois river, Musquitons, Kickapoos of the Wabash, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, and Peorians.

H. or R.]

The President's Speech.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Speeches delivered to the Indians by Brigadier General Putnam. That which he spoke to the Miami, &c., informed them that the Great Chief of the United States had sent a Speech some time ago, as well as one from himself inviting those tribes to peace, and to recommend it to their neighbors, at the same time observing, that a treaty had been concluded with the Wabash Indians, and the hatchet everlastingly buried. "Brothers," said he, "if you will hear me, and not listen to the singing of the birds, carried to your ears by those who would ruin and destroy you, open your ears to my message. My wish is to see you all happy, and that your women and children may lie down in peace, and your young men and hunters live in harmony with the United States. The United States never intended to wrong you out of any of your lands. Send some of your wise men to meet us, who can see and hear the truth, and who will consider your interest well. The road to happiness and peace is open to you. Arise! come and see me, and let us shake hands with one another."

To the Delaware General Putnam also made a Speech, wherein he expresses sentiments, in substance, as follows: "I have lived with you many years. The Great Chief of the United States is a good man. Listen to his words, which he sends by me to you for your good. Many things have happened which were forced to be left in the dark, but they will all come to light, if you will come to the mouth of the Muskingum and hear what we have to say to your people."

Another Speech of the General's, to a different tribe, offers them peace, and requests them to send a Speech to their brothers, desiring them not to stop their ears, but to take the straight road to happiness, which is now laid open to them. "The Great Spirit," said he, "I hope may succeed in bringing about a lasting peace, if your people are as willing as our Great Chief to brighten the chain of friendship. If you will come to Philadelphia, I will provide for your accommodation on the journey, and I request your answer."

After reading the above-mentioned papers, the House took up a memorial presented by Commodore John Hazlewood, respecting services and losses performed and sustained by him during the war, and requiring relief, &c. Read and laid on the table.

Mr. LEE moved that the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the House last session, respecting lost or destroyed certificates, be taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That said Report be made the order of the day for next Monday week.

Ordered, That the Letter and representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the difficulties and inconveniences which attend the discharge of their duties according to the present Judiciary system, referred to in the President's Message of yesterday, be committed to Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. BENSON, Mr. KITTERA, Mr. VENABLE, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for the regulation of pilots, and the superintendence of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers throughout the United States; and that Mr. FRIZZIMONS, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. WILLIAMSON, be the said committee.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated yesterday by the Secretary of War, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the river Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

FRIDAY, November 9.

Another member, to wit: CHRISTOPHER GREENUP, from Kentucky, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, transmitting sundry communications from the Governor of Virginia, containing a correspondence between himself and the Governor of North Carolina, respecting the boundary line between the State of Virginia and the territory South of the river Ohio. These papers contain details of the situation of the unsettled boundaries extending toward the State of Kentucky, and a description of the difference between Walker's and Henderson's lines, which are at some places three miles asunder; and in this space there are upwards of a hundred families which may be claimed by either State, or they need acknowledge neither.

This subject was referred to Messrs. BOUNDNOT, WILLIAMSON, and PAGE.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented an Address, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. MURRAY called the attention of the House to that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which respects the transmission of newspapers throughout the different parts of the Union. He observed, that it had been in contemplation to qualify the Post Office law by a supplement, at the close of the last session; but, from the multiplicity of business crowding in at that time, the measure was relinquished. The same reasons could not operate in the present session, for the subject was particularly mentioned by the PRESIDENT, and ought to be referred to a committee as well as any other division of his communications. For these reasons, Mr. M. moved for the appointment of a committee; but, before any order could be taken on this motion, a member called for the reading of the confidential papers from the War Department, and the SPEAKER ordered the galleries to be cleared.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. LAURANCE reported that the Committee had had the said Address under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then the said Address, as amended, being again read, was, on the question put thereon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"SIR: The House of Representatives, who always feel a satisfaction in meeting you, are much concerned that the occasion for mutual felicitations afforded by the circumstances favorable to the national prosperity should be abated by a continuance of the hostile spirit of many of the Indian tribes, and particularly, that the reiterated efforts for effecting a general pacification with them should have issued in new proofs of their persevering enmity, and the barbarous sacrifice of citizens, who, as the messengers of peace, were distinguishing themselves by their zeal for the public service. In our deliberations on this important department of our affairs, we shall be disposed to pursue every measure that may be dictated by the sincerest desire, on one hand, of cultivating peace, and manifesting, by every practicable regulation, our benevolent regard for the welfare of those misguided people; and by the duty we feel, on the other, to provide effectually for the safety and protection of our fellow-citizens."

"While with regret we learn that symptoms of opposition to the law imposing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, have manifested themselves, we reflect with consolation, that they are confined to a small portion of our fellow-citizens. It is not more essential to the preservation of true liberty, that a Government should be always ready to listen to the representations of its constituents, and to accommodate its measures to the sentiments and wishes of every part of them, as far as will consist with the good of the whole, than it is, that the just authority of the laws should be steadfastly maintained. Under this impression, every Department of the Government, and all good citizens, must approve the measures you have taken, and the purpose you have formed, to execute this part of your trust with firmness and energy; and be assured, sir, of every constitutional aid and co-operation, which may become requisite on our part. And we hope that, while the progress of contentment under the law in question, is as obvious as it is rational, no particular part of the community may be permitted to withdraw from the general burdens of the country, by a conduct as irreconcilable to national justice, as it is inconsistent with public decency."

"The productive state of the Public Revenue, and the confirmation of the credit of the United States abroad, evinced by the loan at Antwerp and Amsterdam, are communications the more gratifying, as they enforce the obligation to enter on systematic and effectual arrangements for discharging the Public Debt, as fast as the conditions of it will permit; and we take pleasure in the opportunity to assure you of our entire concurrence in the opinion, that no measure can be more desirable, whether viewed with an eye to the urgent wish of the community, or the intrinsic importance of promoting so happy a change in our situation.

"The adoption of a Constitution for the State of Kentucky, is an event on which we join in all the satisfaction you have expressed. It may be considered as particularly interesting, since, besides the immediate benefits resulting from it, it is another auspicious demonstration of the facility and success with which an enlightened people is capable of providing, by free and deliberate plans of Government, for their own safety and happiness."

"The operation of the law establishing the Post Office, as it relates to the transmission of newspapers, will merit our particular inquiry and attention, the circulation of political intelligence through these vehicles being justly reckoned among the surest means of preventing the degeneracy of a free Government, as well as of recommending every salutary public measure to the confidence and co-operation of all virtuous citizens."

"The several other matters which you have communicated and recommended, will, in their order, receive the attention due to them, and our discussions will, in all cases, be guided by a proper respect for harmony and stability in the public Councils, and a desire to conciliate, more and more, the attachment of our constituents to the Constitution, by measures accommodated to the true ends for which it was established."

Resolved, That the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the said Address, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. BENSON, and Mr. MURRAY, be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of the merchants of the city of Charleston, in South Carolina. Whereupon,

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, to regulate the fees of the several District Courts of the United States, in all cases of Admiralty proceedings; and that so much of the act for the regulation of seamen in the merchants' service, as makes ships or vessels and their appurtenances liable to seizure and detention, for actions of trivial amount, be repealed; and that, in future, a power be vested in the District Judge, to accept of other sufficient security, in cases where the sum in dispute shall not exceed — dollars.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. WHITE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, reported that the committee had waited on the PRESIDENT, who signified to them that it would be convenient to him to receive the said Address at 12 o'clock on Monday next, at his own house.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER, attended by the House, then withdrew to the house of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and there presented to him the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; to which the PRESIDENT made the following reply:

"GENTLEMEN: It gives me pleasure to express to you the satisfaction which your Address affords me. I feel, as I ought, the approbation you manifest of the measures I have taken, and the purpose I have formed, to maintain, pursuant to the trust reposed in me by the Constitution, the respect which is due to the laws; and the assurance which you, at the same time, give me, of every constitutional aid and co-operation that may become requisite, on your part.

"This is a new proof of that enlightened solicitude for the establishment and confirmation of public order, which, embracing a zealous regard for the principles of true liberty, has guided the deliberations of the House of Representatives: a perseverance in which can alone secure, under the Divine blessing, the real and permanent felicity of our common country.

"G. WASHINGTON."

The House, having returned to their Chamber, resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War, on Wednesday last, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the river Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

TUESDAY, November 13.

Two other members, to wit: ROBERT BARNWELL and DANIEL HUGER, from South Carolina, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. BOURNOR, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 6th instant, together with sundry papers on the subject of the boundary line between the State of Virginia and the Territory of the United States South of the Ohio, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War be notified that this House intend, on Wednesday next, to take into consideration the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under General St. Clair, to the end that they may attend the House, and furnish such information as may be conducive to the due investigation of the matters stated in the said report."

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved to strike out the latter part of the resolution, which respected the attendance of the Secretaries on the House. This motion, if carried, leaves the resolution a simple proposition to inform those officers that the House were, on Wednesday, to take the Report on the failure of General St. Clair's expedition into consideration.

Mr. VENABLE objected generally to the resolution, as inconsistent with the dignity of the House. He doubted the propriety of the measure altogether. The gentlemen are not impeached, and therefore the House has no right to cite them to make their appearance; and, with respect to information, the House can command such from the Heads of Departments as they may see proper to require. He was at a loss in attempting to investigate the object of the resolution. He could see no purpose that it would answer, which could not as well be obtained without it.

Mr. WHITE offered several objections to the resolution, of a similar import with the above.

Mr. DAYTON supported the motion by a few remarks, stating the importance of that information which those gentlemen alone could give. He adverted to the report of the committee, which he observed had exculpated the commanding General on that expedition, whereas he was of opinion that the failure was owing to the misconduct of that gentleman.

Mr. TUCKER objected to the resolution. He preferred the mode of requiring that information which the House might think necessary, in writing.

Mr. MADISON objected to the motion on constitutional grounds, and as being contrary to the practice of the House. He had not, he said, thoroughly revolved the matter in his own mind, and therefore was not prepared to state fully the effects which would result from the adoption of the resolution; but he would hazard thus much, that it would form an innovation in the mode of conducting the business of this House, and introduce a precedent which would lead to perplexing and embarrassing consequences; as it involved a conclusion, in respect to the principles of the Government, which at an earlier day would have been revolved from. He was decidedly in favor of written information.

Mr. CLARK was opposed to the resolution; as a member of the committee who made the report, he had no apprehension; with respect to information, the report and the vouchers are before the House; and such further inquiry may be made of the proper officers as the House may think necessary.

Mr. AMES supported the resolution. He noticed the impressions which the failure of the late expedition had made on the public mind. Characters had suffered in the general estimation. It was of the utmost importance that a thorough investigation should take place, that if the failure of the expedition was a mere casualty, and the fortune of war, it might be made to appear; or, if it was owing to misconduct, the blame might fall on the proper subjects. The mode suggested to obtain information appeared to him the best that could be adopted—the most adequate to the object. It was due to justice, to truth, and to the national honor, to take effectual measures to in-investigate the business thoroughly. This inquiry appears to be the beginning of an arrangement preparatory to an impeachment; on whom this will fall, he should not presume to say; but still it places the subject in an important point of view, and shows, in the strongest manner, the necessity of adopting the best possible mode of ascertaining the real state of facts. This, he conceived, could not be done so effectually as by the mode proposed in the resolution.

Mr. GILES objected to the resolution. He preferred a thorough discussion of the report, in the first place, and a comparison of the vouchers with the report; and if, in the issue, it should appear necessary to call for information from these officers, it could then be done; but, in the present state of the business, to adopt the resolution would place the committee in a very disagreeable situation.

Mr. LAURANCE observed that the committee, in their report, say that, for want of time, they had not been able to complete it; it is, then, apparent from the report itself that it is immature. He stated several particulars in the report which were incomplete, and from hence inferred that there was material information to be received previous to being able to form a competent judgment on the matter. He observed that, as the information must be had, he saw no necessity of postponing the attendance of those officers in the first instance.

Mr. MADISON, in reply to Mr. AMES's remark, that the best possible mode ought to be adopted, observed, that there seemed to be different ideas entertained by the different advocates of the resolution; one seemed to implicate the officers alluded to as parties concerned; another appeared to consider them merely as witnesses. For his part, he thought there was no other way of proceeding, but that of adopting one or the other of these alternatives: either to take up the report and discuss its merits, or for the House to begin the inquiry themselves, de novo.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the resolution. He could not see any advantage which would result from adopting it. He thought the causes of the failure of the expedition were sufficiently obvious, without criminating any body. He adverted to these causes—they were the rawness of the troops, and the superiority of the Indians as marksmen. On these points, he could not see what information could be derived from the Secretary of the Treasury. He thought that the Legislature had gone too far already, and that no satisfaction would result from further proceedings, but that the subject would appear more and more involved.

Mr. BOURNOR, after stating sundry particulars relative to the state of the public mind at the time of the report, adverted to several parts of it which appear to criminate particular persons, some of whom were absent at the time of the investigation on which the report is founded. He therefore urged the necessity of receiving from the Heads of the Departments that information which was requisite to throw light on several parts of the report, and that this ought to be done previous to taking the report into consideration.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he should vote against the resolution. He did not think this the proper time to call for the information alluded to; nor the mode proposed a proper one. Some remarks have been made on the report, though it is not before the House; to these he should not particularly reply, but would only observe, that no person had applied to the House for redress of any supposed injury received by the report. It has been said that the inquiry ought to have been a military one; but it was well known that it was impossible to institute such an inquiry by reason of the want of officers. He then gave a sketch of the mode of proceeding adopted by the committee in conducting the inquiry, to show that they had availed themselves of every means of information within their power.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said he had moved to strike out the latter part of the resolution, but he was equally opposed to the whole of it; and since he had heard the remarks of several gentlemen, on both sides of the House, he was clearly of opinion that the best way was to dispose of it altogether, and to let the subject proceed in the course which it had already taken.

Mr. GILES observed, that he thought there was less delicacy observed on this occasion, in respect to the committee, than was usual in this House. With respect to the report, the vouchers on which every assertion is founded are before the House. As to the incompleteness of the report, it is an immaterial object; the few blanks it contains are occasioned by the want of time to examine the voluminous papers necessary to be examined, in order to ascertain some of the facts—facts not in themselves of the first importance. He observed, that he had not the smallest objection to the full investigation of the subject; he was in favor of all the information that could be possibly obtained; he objected not only to the mode now contended for, which he thought not only liable to all the objections which had been made, but to many others which might be offered.

Mr. DAYTON observed, that he was one of those who were not satisfied with the report; he did not think the conclusion which exculpated the commanding officer could be supported by the report itself. He adverted to several facts stated in it, which showed that the commander must have been highly culpable; he instanced the slowness of his movements, the dilatoriness in constructing forts, and his being surprised by the enemy. He thought that the remarks which had fallen from gentlemen, on what he had said, were illiberal, as they had virtually impeached his candor, when he was not conscious of deviating from its dictates. It was not his intention to have touched on the merits of the report, but he had been impelled to do it from the turn the debate had taken.

Mr. GERRY was in favor of the resolution. He enlarged on the magnitude of the object of investigation, and insisted that it was the indispensable duty of the House thoroughly to probe the subject to the bottom, that if any persons have been to blame they may suffer, or if the event which has taken place, by which the national character has suffered, and so severe an expense has been incurred, amounting probably to one million dollars, has been owing to circumstances which could not be avoided or controlled, the public may receive satisfaction as to the whole matter.

Defeat of General St. Clair.

Mr. PAGE objected to the resolution, particularly to the precedent it would establish; but, at the same time, he was in favor of the fullest inquiry the subject was susceptible of. He said, that the mode proposed would operate to clog the freedom of inquiry, and the freedom of debate.

Mr. AMES, alluding to the spirit of the report, pointed out the peculiar situation of the two Secretaries, and that they did not stand on the same ground with other persons who are not so intimately implicated in the matter. He alluded to the various objections which had been urged from precedent, from the fullness of the investigation which the subject had undergone in the hands of the Committee, and from the remark by Mr. LIVERMORE, that sufficient had already been done. To this last objection he particularly replied, by saying that the public wanted further satisfaction, and that the House could not justify themselves to their constituents without a stricter and fuller investigation, that the whole of the facts might be laid before them.

Mr. MADISON said, the mode now proposed involved a dereliction of the only practicable mode of transacting public business; and that, however imperfect that mode might be, still he believed that it was the only one that had received the sanction of experience and utility. He therefore hoped that the resolution would be rejected, and the mode already adopted persevered in, and the necessary information called for in writing, from every person in anywise interested or competent to give it.

Mr. W. SMITH supported the resolution. He showed by the report itself, and from the reasoning used by gentlemen in opposition to the resolution, that the two Secretaries were implicated in the causes of the failure of the expedition; from hence, he inferred the justice and propriety of giving them an opportunity of exculpating themselves.

Mr. GERRY expressed surprise at the apprehension which some gentlemen appear to entertain of the measure of introducing the Heads of Departments into the House; for his part he had no such apprehensions. The Secretary will attend at the orders of the House merely to give such information as may be required, and not as members or ministers, to influence and govern the determinations of the House.

Mr. VENABLE objected further to the resolution; he urged the impropriety of any of the Heads of Departments coming forward, and attempting in any way to influence the deliberations of the Legislature.

Mr. LAURANCE replied to Mr. VENABLE; he observed that the gentleman appeared to mistake the object of the resolution; it was not contemplated that either of the Secretaries should appear on the floor of the House to influence, in any degree, its decisions; they are to be called on merely for information.

Mr. MURRAY objected to the resolution. The report, he observed, is made to the House; if in the course of its discussion any further light or information should be deemed necessary, it may then be called for, and in that mode which shall appear most eligible—at present the question appears to be premature. Mr. MURRAY added several other remarks, and then the question being put, Mr. WILLIAMSON'S motion, for striking out was carried.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said resolution as amended, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is referred the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, for their information.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the several disbursements of money made by the Department of War in the years 1790 and 1791.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War on Wednesday last, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the River Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

WEDNESDAY, November 14.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM BARRY GROVE, from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A petition of John Blake, Joseph Bindon, John D. Mercer, and Benjamin Thompson, on behalf of themselves and other Canadian refugees, was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for losses and injuries sustained in their persons and property, by adhering to the American cause, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. DAYTON, Mr. BENJAMIN BOTWINE, and Mr. MURRAY; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and that Mr. WHITE, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. WILLIAMSON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS be added to the committee to whom was referred the petition of James Warrington, attorney in fact for Joseph Blachford, surviving partner of Harris & Blachford, late of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1793; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

NOVEMBER, 1792.]

Defeat of General St. Clair.

[H. OF R.]

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration that part of the President's Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session for the regulation of the Post Office; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. AMES, and Mr. BARNWELL, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, together with a memorial of Samuel Hodgdon, late Quartermaster General to the Army, respectively praying that they may be heard, and permitted to give information and explanations as to the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair; which were read. The Letter of the Secretary of War is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 14, 1792.

SIR: After the close of the last session of Congress I saw with much concern the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition, under Major General St. Clair, of the 8th of May, 1792; which, having been presented to the House in the last moments of the session, was ordered to be printed, and has since circulated in the public newspapers throughout the United States, containing suggestions, most of them founded upon ex parte investigation, which have been understood in a sense very injurious to my reputation.

Learning that the present day was appointed for taking into consideration the above mentioned report, I have waited with anxious expectation for some act of the House enabling me to attend the progress of the examination upon which they are about to enter, for the purpose of furnishing such information and explanations as might conduce to a right understanding of facts, in which I am so materially implicated. The failure of a proposition, which I am informed was made to the House with that view, has added to my solicitude and regret.

Thus situated, I feel myself called upon to ask of the justice of the House that some mode may be devised, by which it will be put into my power to be present during the course of the intended inquiry, as well to hear the evidence on which the several allegations contained in the report are founded, as to offer the information and explanations to which I have alluded.

To this step I am impelled by a persuasion that an accurate and satisfactory investigation cannot otherwise be had with equal advantage, if at all. And my entire reliance upon the equity and impartiality of the House, will not permit a doubt to exist on my part that such an investigation will be exclusively the object of their desire and pursuit.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX.

The SPEAKER of the honorable the House of Representatives of the U. S. DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

And then the order of the day, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, being taken up—

Mr. MADISON suggested that the most simple, most practicable and consistent plan would be, to recommit the report of the select committee, and refer the present applications* to the committee to whom the report shall be re-committed. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from considering the reports on the causes of the failure of the late expedition.

Mr. SMITH (S. C.) observed that several objections struck him in opposition to this motion. The House must at some period, said he, meet this case; if it is re-committed, there will be an impropriety in referring it to the same committee; if a new committee is appointed, they must begin the whole subject de novo; and, if their investigation should take up such a length of time as that of the former committee, the session will be expended, and at the close of it the business will recur on the House, and the same discussion will occur again that is now proposed. He hoped the House would therefore proceed in the consideration of the report, assign two or three days in the week for the purpose, and continue the investigation till the whole is finished.

Mr. GRASS replied, that he had no doubt that the vouchers on which the committee had founded the report would appear sufficient to justify the decisions that they had made. He said that he did not suppose that the applicants would adduce any new information; one of them had been called on, he attended the committee, and he supposed that he had furnished all the information he was in possession of. He objected to a recommitment; as one of the committee, he was perfectly satisfied with the report; nor did he conceive there was any additional evidence to be produced, except it was of a recent date.

Mr. AMES said, he perceived such a disinclination to go into the subject as indicated a proper temper of mind in relation to the persons supposed to be any ways interested in the ultimate decision of the House. He was opposed to a recommitment, as it would procrastinate instead of expediting the inquiry. He adverted to the report. Facts are stated; the public have been left to draw the inferences; the committee have not explicitly criminated any body; but they have determined, in several instances, who is not to blame. What is the situation of those who are implicated in the causes of the failure? Every citizen knows that, in consequence of the issue of the expedition, clamors against the War Department, in respect to Indian affairs, have rung through the Continent. Should public officers, who have been placed in situations of such importance be silent, and submit calmly to such imputations, they would be unworthy of public confidence, unworthy to breathe the vital air. They now apply for an opportunity to be heard in their own vindication. Shall they be sent to a Committee-room, and make their defence against the allegations brought forward to their disadvantage, which have been published to the world, in the hearing of perhaps ten or a dozen persons only? He hoped not—he thought justice to them and to the public required that they should be allowed to make their defence in the face of the world. Will not precluding them look like a wish to smother all further inquiry into the matter?

Mr. BALDWIN was in favor of recommitting; he said it was the most eligible mode, and was consonant to the practice of the House.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that it had been said a disposition was discovered to smother inquiry. In reply he observed that, if he wished to prevent a thorough investigation, he should be in favor of the whole subject being undertaken by the House; because, he observed, that if a select committee of a few members took seven weeks to form an incomplete report, it must appear evident that so large a body as this House could never get through the matter. He further observed, that the same reason existed for referring the residue of the evidence to a select committee as induced the measure in the first instance.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he was at first in favor of a recommitment, but on further consideration he was convinced the House would be able to get through the subject in a shorter time than a select committee. He added several other reasons which induced him to be in favor of the House proceeding with the report.

Mr. GERRY said it appeared to him that the only question seemed to be, whether the House or the select committee shall establish the facts. If these facts are established by the committee, would it give equal satisfaction as if they were established by the House? He conceived it would not; but, should the result be a conviction on the part of the House that some of the officers are culpable, will the House rest an impeachment on the report of the committee? He conceived the House ought to found their decisions on facts ascertained by themselves. It has been said there is no difference between the House and the committee. If this is the case, does it not imply a censure by the House on certain characters? He thought it did. It therefore becomes the House to discuss the report, that it may be determined on what footing it stands. If, in the case of a contested election the House revolted from the idea of submitting their judgment to facts substantiated by a committee, the case before us is of unspeakably greater magnitude. For these, and several other reasons, he hoped the report would not be recommitment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON was in favor of the motion for recommitting; he supported his opinion by the uniform practice of the House, which in every case where new evidence was adduced, always provided that the new evidence should be examined by the same committee, who had originally brought in the report. He said if this mode was departed from, we should find no committee would bring forward a state of facts in future. He thought it was not treating the committee with proper candor to decide on their report in its present situation.

Mr. SYLVESTER observed, that the resolution of the House at the close of the last session, that they would take up the subject early in the present session, precluded a recommitment; he was therefore opposed to the motion.

Mr. BOUDINOT was in favor of a recommitment; he said, if there is new evidence to be brought forward, the House ought to wait till that is received and reported at the Clerk's table; and this he conceived ought to be done in the usual way, by a select committee; till the whole testimony is completed it appeared to him the House was not prepared to take one step in the matter.

Mr. MADISON replied to Mr. GERRY's allusion to the case of the contested election. He inquired of him whether the House itself went into an investigation of facts in the first instance? He believed he would not say they did. With respect to the memorials, he inquired, whether, if they had been presented at the time of the investigation of the subject by the select committee, they would not have been referred to the committee? If they would then have been referred, the same reason exists for referring them to a select committee at the present time.

Mr. LAURANCE was of opinion that a recommitment would tend to a saving of time; the committee will not be obliged to go over the same ground again that has already been explored; all they will be obliged to do is, to investigate the new testimony which will be adduced. He hoped, therefore, that the motion would prevail.

Mr. GILES said, that the proceedings of the committee were public, and that the Secretaries could have attended all the time, had they seen proper. They attended but once, and then appeared extremely anxious "to get away to attend to their offices." The committee would have been extremely glad to have had those gentlemen present oftener, and to receive all the information they could give, and supposed they had done it.

Mr. GERRY replied to Mr. MADISON. He said, if gentlemen would recur to the proceedings of the House on the contested election, they will find that the House expressly reserved to itself the right of substantiating the facts, which should appear from an examination of the depositions taken in conformity to the resolutions of the House; and here he adverted to the mode pointed out by the House in taking those depositions. The adverse party was to be summoned to attend to the taking them; but in this report it appears that ex parte evidence has been admitted as the foundation on which some of the decisions have been made.

Mr. MURRAY supported the motion for a recommitment. He observed that the matter, in its present state, was so incomplete that he could not see how the House could proceed upon it. One part of the evidence only is finished, and the report is made on that evidence. Now, we are told new testimony is offered; let the whole be brought into view at once, and then the House will be in a situation to judge.

Mr. PAGE was in favor of a further commitment of the subject; but whether to the committee who made the report, or to a new committee, he should not take upon him to say.

Defeat of General St. Clair.

[NOVEMBER, 1792.]

respect to the admission of any Head of a Department to the bar of this House, except in case of an impeachment, he would never consent to it. It would be a precedent of a most dangerous nature, tending to a destruction of all freedom of inquiry by committees.

Mr. FINDLEY observed, that the committee wished that Mr. Hodgdon should have been present, but he did not make his appearance; the committee therefore proceeded on the testimony they had, and as there is now new evidence brought forward, he thought it was proper that the report should be recommitted. As one of the committee, he should have no objections to such alterations as might appear proper on further and more complete investigation of the matter.

Mr. STEELE called for the reading of a clause in the memorial of the Secretary of War, which states that the committee had drawn conclusions from ex parte evidence. This being read, Mr. STEELE remarked on the want of candor towards the committee, which had been shown by some of the members in the course of their observations. He then adverted to the above clause respecting ex parte evidence, and observed that, with respect to the Secretary of War, it was not true that the committee had proceeded on ex parte evidence; that officer, said he, was notified of the meetings of the committee; he attended those meetings; he furnished the committee with papers and documents, &c.; and further, he was requested to detain officers in town whose testimony was necessary in the matter, and that he complained of some of those officers being detained by the delays of the committee from the recruiting service. With respect to Mr. Hodgdon the same cannot be said, as he was not then in the country.

Mr. STEELE then concluded by some additional remarks on the indelicacy manifested by some gentlemen in their treatment of the committee, and observed that he did not apply it to himself personally, but as it respected the committee at large, he thought proper to express the contempt which he conceived it merited.

Mr. DAYTON replied to Mr. STEELE. He repeated the substance of his original remarks on the report, and added, that in the course of the discussion he should attempt to show that the deductions made in several parts of the report were false. Mr. D. added, that whatever the gentleman last speaking might say, as one of the committee who signed the report, he was certainly implicated in whatever censure it merited.

The question for a recommitment was then agreed to, 30 to 22. And it was accordingly Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was committed the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said report, together with the documents relating thereto, including the Letter of the Secretary of War, and the memorial of Samuel Hodgdon, be recommitted to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GILES, Mr. STEELE, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. FINDLEY.

THURSDAY, November 15.
Another member, to wit: THEODORE SEDGWICK, from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels: which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying an extract of a letter to him, from James Seagrave, temporary agent to the Creek Indians, dated the 28th ultimo, containing further information relative to Indian affairs in the Southern department; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, November 16.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins," and for other purposes," to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The message also communicated a Letter from Messrs. Hebert & Co., of the city of Paris, addressed to the Congress of the United States, stating certain propositions for the purchase of a quantity of vacant lands, the property of the United States.

The Letter referred to in the said Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," was read the first time.

Ordered, That Mr. VENABLE and Mr. STEELE be added to the committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the President's Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session for the regulation of the Post Office.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War on the 7th instant, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the River Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

MONDAY, November 19.

Another member, to wit: JOHN FRANCIS MERCER, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Commissioners appointed by the act entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," stating the amount of the purchases which have been made of the Public Debt, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by the said act," which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial and address from the people called

Quakers, from their several religious societies in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will adopt such measures as, in their wisdom, may be deemed salutary and effectual for securing peace and friendship with the original holders of this land.

Ordered. That the said memorial and address do lie on the table.

A petition of Thomas Screven, executor of Brigadier General James Screven, deceased, was presented to the House and read, praying the removal of sundry Continental Loan Office certificates, the property of the said deceased, which were burnt, or otherwise destroyed by the enemy, during the late war.

Ordered. That the said petition be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is committed the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting lost and destroyed certificates.

Ordered. That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury concerning marine hospitals, which was made on the 17th of April last, together with the report of a committee thereupon, which was made on the 28th of the same month, be referred to the committee last appointed.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN COMMERCE.

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved that a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for promoting commerce, by the increase of American seamen. In moving the above, Mr. W. addressed the House as follows:

Much of your time during the present session, Mr. SPEAKER, will be employed in deliberating upon the several important subjects that have been recommended to us by the President. The numerous and lengthy bills that you inherit from the last session, must also demand a considerable portion of your time. Observing so much interesting and weighty business, from which you cannot turn aside, it is with some reluctance that I bespeak the attention of the House, while I submit to their consideration another subject of some importance: for it is a subject, unless I am mistaken, that interests the merchant and the planter.

Measures have already been taken by Congress, for increasing the number of our shipping; but no effectual and general measure has been adopted for increasing the number of native American seamen. Every gentleman in my hearing knows, that there are always a considerable number of foreigners employed on board American vessels; but none of us could have expected, and some of us may not have heard of the injury and insults to which our commerce has been exposed, from having British seamen on board our ships.

A schooner called the David and George, belonging to Portsmouth, in Virginia, and commanded by Captain Goffigan, lately touched at Sierra Leone, on the coast of Africa; she was navigated by eleven persons. Three of that number who had been on shore, informed Captain Wickham who commanded an armed vessel, that they were British subjects. Captain Wickham went on board the American vessel and claimed the three seamen; he also claimed wages for them. Captain Goffigan refused to deliver the men, and declared with truth that nothing was due them. Captain Wickham took the men by force, and by the same regulation he went into the hold, and took as much of the cargo as he thought fit, under the cover of substitute for wages. Captain Goffigan complained of this violence and robbery to Mr. Clarkson, who is Governor of the Province. The Governor replied, that he should have done the same thing, and that he had orders from his superiors so to act in such cases.

The ship Illustrious President, belonging to Virginia, commanded by Captain Butler, touched some time ago at Maderia, in her passage to the East Indies. The British frigate Hyena, commanded by Captain Hargood, lay at that time in the road. Seven of Captain Butler's sailors being British subjects, Captain Hargood sent to take them by force from on board the American ship, and he would have done so, had not the Governor of the Island, remembering what he owed to the honor of his nation and to every ship under his protection, interrupted his authority.

The ship Fame belonging to Philadelphia, commanded by Walter Sims, on her way to the Cape Indies, lately touched at Table Bay, at the Cape of Good Hope. Captain Blith, who commanded a ship of twenty guns, then lay in the road. One of Captain Sims's sailors, a native of Scotland, offered his service to Captain Blith, calling himself a British subject. That very man in Philadelphia had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States; but the British claim was best, for Captain Blith's ship was strongest. He took the man, sent an officer on board the American ship, who took the liberty of opening the after hatch, searching the hold and looking out a chest and clothes. Captain Blith justified these acts of violence, by saying, that he had printed instructions to take all who called themselves British subjects. These are a few out of the numberless cases in which our ships have been robbed of their seamen, and they are samples of the manner in which we shall be constantly treated, while we depend on foreigners to navigate our ships. If these cases had terminated in threats and abusive language, to which our flag is too much accustomed, it might have been questioned, whether the nation of the offending party was to blame. When you are told by one officer and another, that he is instructed to distress our trade, we should, if possible, deprive them of the present excuse. Is it not our business to inquire into the cause of this strange conduct? By a vitiated passion for British goods, we are universally clothed in the manufactures of that nation. Our debts increase every year, and we labor to make her rich, while we are becoming poor. We pour our treasures into her lap more than any other nation under the sun. Observe the rewards! I say nothing about her measures on our Western Frontier; but our trading ships are boarded and plundered at discretion by her ships of war; and yet, Great Britain, whose commerce we cherish, is the only nation that treats us in this manner. Perhaps it is conjectured, that Americans are of that species of animals whose favor is increased by rough treatment. Be this as it may, it is our duty to consider of the safest and surest mode of extending our commerce. After we have been told, that an American vessel having sailors on board, who chance to have been born in the British dominion, is subject to be deprived of her hands, robbed of her property, and turned adrift without help, it can hardly be necessary to adduce other arguments in favor of native American seamen; but other strong and conclusive arguments in favor of the measure present themselves. The merchants' property in critical situations, or in distant and obscure parts of the world, is always most safe when his ship is navigated by men who uniformly strive to return to their native home, and whose hopes and happiness centre in that country to which their ship belongs. The crew of a French brig some weeks ago, murdered their captain and mate on our coast; that misfortune, in all probability, would not have happened, if the seamen had been natives of France. Two of them only were of that Kingdom. Is it necessary to add, that a powerful body of seamen, at some future day, may save us from the vast expense and danger of a standing army? Upon this single argument of native seamen we might rest the question. It needs neither support nor illustration. I shall, therefore, presume, that it is our duty as soon as possible, to provide for the daily operations of pride or injustice, by furnishing the merchant with seamen, of whom he cannot be robbed, except by open declaration of war. With seamen in whom he can trust—with men, who actuated by those passions which are inseparable from the human breast, the pride of nation, and the love of country, may serve him in every part of the world. To furnish the nation with a safe and strong bulwark against foreign tyranny and invasion.

This conclusion, however, is drawn upon the supposition, that foreign commerce should be encouraged; but, I am aware that objections have been made to every measure that has foreign commerce for its object, and similar objections would fall with additional weight against any plan for supporting foreign commerce by native seamen. We are told, that in a country where land is plenty and the inhabitants few; where little progress is made in cultivating the soil, the Legislature should consider agriculture as the primary object of their attention. This is a position that will not be disputed, since we know that the hope of our species must prosper or perish; that our numbers must be many or few, according as the soil is well or ill cultivated; according to the abundance or scarcity of provisions. These facts being granted, we are only to inquire, what are the most certain and effectual means of promoting agriculture? To this I reply, that we can promote agriculture by extending foreign commerce, and by no other direct means whatever. Bounties can never prove effectual; they may serve to introduce a foreign plant, but they cannot produce industry nor plenty. The general demand for any article never fails to increase the manufacture of that article. The great demand for provisions to be exported, will not fail to produce abundance of provisions in the country.

The simple calls of nature, the mere necessity of supporting life, is not a sufficient spring to active industry; it seldom gives birth to persevering diligence. Artificial wants and passions must come to our assistance, before we can shake off the indolence of nature, and apply ourselves steadily to work. Let a man discover that industry will procure him the luxuries as well as the necessities of life, and he will not fail to work. Let the farmer see a ready market for all the produce that is not consumed by his family, and he will commonly have something to sell; let no such market present itself, and his family will frequently suffer from the want of necessities. Every man who considers the effects of frequent and long embargoes, must discover that they generally produce a scarcity of provisions. The late war operated in this country as an embargo. What was the effect? The spirit of agriculture became torpid; the plow slept in the furrow. Let us for a moment cast an eye on the history of cities and nations. They have risen into greatness or sunk into obscurity, according to the measure of their commerce. By the creative power of foreign commerce, Palmyra and Alexandria arose out of sandy deserts, and Venice out of the sea. By the same power we have seen nations become wealthy and numerous.

If we agree that industry, population and wealth, are promoted by foreign commerce, it will certainly be granted that our commerce should be managed by native citizens. In order to secure a sufficient number of seamen, we should make it the interest of every master or owner of a vessel to have one or more apprentices. For this purpose, it may be proper to impose a small additional duty of tonnage on every American bottom, perhaps one cent per ton may be sufficient. A drawback of ninety per cent of this duty may be allowed, to such vessels as are navigated by a certain number of apprentices, native citizens of the United States, according to their several burdens. I have mentioned ninety per cent, because it may be proper that a small portion of this duty should pass to a separate account that shall presently be mentioned. The amount of domestic tonnage for the last year was $504,900, at six cents per ton, this giving $30,294; hence it will follow, that one additional cent per ton would produce $5,049. The amount is small, perhaps it should be doubled.

While I am recommending the increase of American seamen, I should not do justice to my own feelings, if I did not recommend another measure that is equally connected with commerce. I mean a general provision for sick and infirm seamen. I do not contemplate the building of two or three great houses in some of our principal cities; houses that might administer to the vanity of a nation, rather than to the general comfort of sick and infirm sailors. I would consult the cause of humanity, not of pride.

Wherever it is probable that sailors may be sick, there I would make provision for their support and comfort. Hospitals should be erected, or lodgings hired, as the case may be, at every port of entry in the United States for sick and infirm seamen, where they may be properly attended during their several indispositions. The money to be collected at the several ports as hospital money, should be expended at such port, and at no other place, under the care of such persons as may be described for that purpose. Let a small deduction be made from the wages of every seaman, to be paid at the several ports of entry for their use. I have mentioned a deduction from their wages, because this mode of raising hospital money would probably be most acceptable, and because it is certainly the most equitable tax that can be levied.

It will readily be perceived, that the two subjects I have mentioned are nearly allied. While we attempt to increase the number of native seamen for the extension of commerce and general prosperity of agriculture, we should be solicitous to protect and cherish this useful class of our fellow-citizens. The direct tendency of the additional tonnage, is to increase the number of apprentices, and if this measure should have the desired effect, the greater part of that duty will be discharged in drawbacks. A small portion of the duty will be retained according to the plan mentioned, and some owners, less careful, will occasionally pay the whole duty. Perhaps the product of the additional cent may be $1,000 per annum. This balance may very properly be applied towards a fund for sick and infirm seamen. This fund, however, being contingent, and at most very inadequate to the general use of seamen, it may be necessary to make a small stoppage of their wages as a uniform and certain fund for the support of those very persons when they are sick.

Such are the outlines of two bills that I would recommend to the attention of this House. If I have viewed these subjects in a more serious light; if I have been more anxious than other members to bring them before the House, the situation of my constituents, and the laws of our State, will be my excuse. That part of North Carolina in which I live, abounds in navigable waters, many of my fellow-citizens are owners of vessels, and many go to sea.

The Legislature of North Carolina, attentive to the wants and desires of the people, have lately passed a law to raise money by a tax on the wages of seamen, for the support of sick and infirm seamen. This is a sufficient proof of their desire to cherish commerce, and give particular assistance to those useful members of the community.

I shall now take the liberty of moving that committees may be appointed to bring in bills for the purposes mentioned.

MR. WILLIAMSON, MR. LAURANCE, MR. GOODRUE, MR. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and MR. BARNWELL, were appointed to prepare and bring in the same.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress:

On that part which relates to the reduction of the Public Debt, Mr. FITZSIMONS offered a resolution to the following purport: "Resolved, That measures for the reduction of so much of the public debt as the United States have a right to redeem, ought to be adopted; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a plan for the purpose."

MR. MADISON wished for information before he could agree to the motion just made. The exact state of our finances he conceived necessary to be well known before measures were taken for the reduction of the debt. The House of Representatives had already unequivocally expressed their sentiments on the subject, in their answer to the PRESIDENT'S Speech; but it was not time, he conceived, for the adoption of measures with a view to realize what appeared to be the general wish, until the information on which those measures were to be grounded was received.

MR. FITZSIMONS argued, that the motion, if adopted, would call forth the information necessary to ground a final measure upon. The recommendation from the PRESIDENT was strong, and the answer of the House as positive; no difference of opinion, he therefore supposed, could exist as to the propriety of reducing the debt. The United States had paid a valuable consideration for the right of reducing it, and the first opportunity of making use of that right, he conceived the best.

MR. WILLIAMSON was of opinion that information would come in of course. The PRESIDENT, he suggested, no doubt was acquainted with the situation of the revenue, when he recommended the reduction of the debt at the present time. He should be in favor of the motion. He declared it as his opinion, that our public debt was our most dangerous enemy; he wished it could be reduced twice as fast; the irredeemable quality of part of it he much disliked.

MR. MADISON again expressed it as his opinion that information should form the basis of any provision for the reduction of the debt. If the motion was carried, information no doubt could be obtained before the final adoption of any measure; but he insisted on the necessity of making that information the groundwork of any proceeding on so important a subject.

MR. MERCER.—No question, he conceived, was of more importance than that involved in the motion before the House. He wished for time to make up his mind on it. It involved one question which had occasioned very warm debate in the House, and which was decided but by a small majority: he alluded to the reference made last session to the Secretary of the Treasury. He conceived it improper to commit to any man what he was bound himself to do. He conceived the power of the House to originate plans of finance, to lay new burdens on the people intrusted to them by their constituents, as incommunicable. As to the main object of the motion, he rather doubted the propriety of adopting, at present, a premature system for the reduction of the public debt. The House, he said, stood in a very delicate situation. A fuller representation will shortly succeed the present. He saw a propriety in making a temporary provision to redeem, in order to secure the right of reducing in future. He hoped the House would consent to a delay of a day or two, when members would be better prepared.

MR. SMITH, of South Carolina, conceived, that as the motion had been made and seconded, some decision must be obtained on it, or that the Committee must rise. He saw no good reason for leaving it to a future House to adopt a permanent plan of reduction. If it was now thought too early a period to accomplish so desirable an object, it would be a good reason for deferring it; but if it was full time, measures for that purpose should be adopted; they should go forward. If the gentleman required further time to make up his mind, the Committee might rise, and sit again in a day or two.

He next made some reply to the objections of the gentleman last up, to that part of the motion which contemplated a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury. The ultimate decision, he remarked, in no one point, was relinquished by such a reference. If such a reference was unconstitutional, he observed, much business had been conducted in the House in an unconstitutional manner, by repeated references to the Heads of Departments. The reference of business to select committees would be unconstitutional, he said, on the same ground.

Turning on the main question—the House, he conceived, were in possession of information already, that would warrant a beginning in the work of reducing the public debt. From the report of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, read in the morning, it appeared that they had funds remaining in their hands.

The House had pledged themselves, in their answer to the PRESIDENT'S Address, to proceed on the task: now to refer the subject to a future Congress, would appear like great reluctance to go into the measure, and would argue great unsteadiness. The system to be adopted for the purpose contemplated, could not, he conceived, be attempted, in the first instance, in so large a body as a Committee of the Whole House. He hoped the question on the motion would obtain a decision at the present time; but if the gentleman persisted in requesting a delay, he wished the Committee to rise, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. SEDGWICK conceived, the House did not need any more information than they were in possession of, to see the propriety of adopting immediate measures for the reduction of the debt. The United States, it was evident, he said, were paying more than the market interest upon their debt. It sells above par, and, considering the rate at which loans can be obtained in Europe on the credit of the United States, that mode of reducing the debt was, he said, incontrovertibly eligible. It would be economical for an individual, in similar circumstances, to effect a reduction; and the case was the same, the United States being in the place of that individual. It was agreed to in the House, he said, and re-echoed out of doors, that a public debt was a public evil; it was the duty, therefore, of the Representatives of the people, to use all the means in their power, whenever opportunity offered, to reduce it.

He made some observations on the propriety of referring the subject to the Secretary, for information and his opinion; and concluded by declaring, that, viewing the main question as he first stated, he could not see any necessity in deferring a question on the motion.

MR. MERCER expressed some surprise at the disinclination some gentlemen appeared to show to a full discussion on so important a subject. He again objected to a reference. That mode of conducting business in the House, he said, had given very general dissatisfaction. The mode was adopted by a small majority. The House had received, since its adoption, an accession of new members; besides, since, every member had mixed with his constituents, and opinions might consequently have varied since that time. For his part, he said, he should pay great and implicit regard to the opinion of his constituents.

He again adverted to the nature of the trust reposed in the House by the Constitution, in originating money bills, &c., and dwelt on the true import of the word originate, which he conceived could not be explained away, so as to warrant a reference. Besides, he argued, is not a body selected from millions of the people more adequate to the task of originating than a single man?

He hoped that respect to the PRESIDENT'S recommendation would never make the House inattentive to the great interests of the people. The PRESIDENT'S Address had not been so long before the House, as that a short delay should argue disrespect. But the PRESIDENT, in his Address, did not, he said, recommend a reference to the Secretary.

He was willing to give a decision on the first part of the motion, though he would prefer a delay of a day or two; if this, however, was not granted, he should call, he said, for a division of the question. He again adverted to the propriety of taking advantage of the redeemable quality of our debt as soon as possible; observing that the next term of payment of interest came round with the new year.

MR. FITZSIMONS observed, that he was in the minority on the question adverted to by the gentleman from Maryland [MR. MERCER]; that he had not since altered his opinion upon that subject, but considered the present reference as very different from the former, and entirely within the letter and spirit of the act for establishing the Treasury Department. He did not believe it would be necessary to impose additional burdens, to effect a reduction of the debt. He believed that the existing finances, assisted by a foreign loan, would enable the United States to accomplish the object. As to the reports from the Treasury or other officers, they will stand on their own merits. If they are bad, they will be rejected.

MR. MADISON drew a distinction between the deliberative functions of the House and the ministerial functions of the Executive powers. The deliberative functions, he conceived, should be first exercised before the ministerial began to act. It should be decided by the House, in the first instance, he conceived, whether the debt should be reduced by imposing new taxes, or by varying the burdens, or by new loans. The fundamental principles of any measure, he was of opinion, should be decided in the House, perhaps even before a reference to a select committee. He did not pretend to determine whether the motion now before the House might not involve a reference of a ministerial nature merely. But he well knew, he said, that the act establishing the Treasury Department had been so construed as to give it a greater latitude than was contemplated when the law passed, much against the opinion of a great portion of the people. In the infancy of our Government, that latitude perhaps might be necessary; but he saw no necessity for it at present.

Mr. PAGES opposed a division of the question, as precluding debate. He wished the motion amended, by striking out the last part.

Mr. FINDLEY was against a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury of a matter which, he conceived, was made the exclusive business of the House by the Constitution.

Mr. MERCER expressed himself in favor of striking out the last part of the motion.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was of a different opinion. His constituents, he conceived, expected their business to be done in the best manner possible, and that he should not rely on his own information only, but endeavor to avail himself of the information of others. He said he should consider himself unequal to the task of taking a share in legislating for the Union, if he was to depend on his own information alone. He expected to derive information from every source. It was the intention of meeting in Congress to collect information from every quarter.

He should despise any one, he said, he should despise himself, if he thought his judgment could be improperly influenced by any plan reported by any of the Heads of Departments. If any system originating with the Head of a Department, appeared the best that could be devised, it should meet the approbation of the House; but if any amendment was thought of, it was the duty of the House to adopt or reject it, according to its merits. He considered reports in the light of information, and dwelt on the necessity of receiving information from every quarter. He was against striking out.

Mr. FINDLEY was in favor of striking out. He was a friend to information, he said, but the reports from Heads of Departments he did not consider in the light of information merely. It was information, and plans built on that, and those plans supported by arguments.

Though a law, he said, had made it the province of the Secretary of the Treasury to report those plans, the Constitution had not enjoined the House to refer; and he hoped the House, being the masters of their own proceedings, would originate such measures themselves. The House had a right to, and, he conceived, should call for what information was wanted to enable them to digest their own plans.

Mr. MADISON saw some difficulty in drawing the exact line between subjects of legislative and ministerial deliberations, but still such a line most certainly existed. Gentlemen who argued the propriety of calling on the Secretary for information, plans, and propositions, involved the propriety of permitting that officer, in the shape of a plan or measure, to propose a new tax, and say whether it should be a direct or indirect one. Yet, if it was proposed directly to give this power to the Secretary, few members, he believed, would agree to it. He was in favor of striking out.

Mr. GERRY said, that while the law establishing the Treasury Department was under consideration, tion, he had opposed that part of the bill which gave the Secretary power to propose to the House a tax, and a plan to carry it into execution. He conceived such a power contrary to the principles of the Constitution. This power is, however, involved in that part of the law which authorizes him to propose, without being called on, plans for the support of credit, for the reduction of the public debt, &c. The Secretary, nevertheless, knowing probably that that power, granted him by the law, was looked upon with a jealous eye by many members of the House, has never exercised it.

He, however, was not averse to referring the object of the motion to the Secretary. He saw an impossibility, if taken up in Committee of the Whole, in rendering the intended measure an uniform part of the great financial whole. The clashing of various opinions would prevent it. If the influence of the Secretary was formidable, he conceived it would be much more dangerous if exerted against a select committee, than in the whole House. He hoped the last part of the resolution would not be struck out.

On motion, the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, November 20.

On a motion made and seconded that there be allowed to Joseph Henderson — per annum, in compensation for his services as Naval Paymaster to the Navy Board, for the Eastern Department, from the 5th day of August, 1778, to — 1782—

Ordered, That the said motion, together with the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the said Joseph Henderson, which was made to this House on the 30th of April last, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A memorial of William Constable and Company, merchants of the city of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed the amount of the drawback on a quantity of teas exported from the port of New York, and duly landed in the port of Dunkirk, in France, in the year 1790, of which they are possessed of sufficient evidence, although not in the form prescribed by law.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

THE MILITIA LAW.

A motion was made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to amend the Militia law passed last session.

Mr. LIVERMORE rose to inquire, what particular part of the law was the object of the resolution? Mr. MURRAY explained. He informed the House that it had special reference to the clause which respects arming the Militia. He said, the injunctions of the law, in this particular, imposed equal burdens, on shoulders infinitely disproportioned as to their capacity to sustain them; it enjoins duties on the major part of the Militia, of such a nature, as renders the law totally impracticable. A man not worth one farthing, is subjected to the same expense with one who may be worth ten thousand pounds a year; the inequality, evident in the operation of such a requisition, is a glaring instance of injustice, and calls loudly for Legislative interposition and relief. He adverted to the particular situation of the State of Maryland, to show the impracticability of carrying the law into execution in that part of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMSON suggested an alteration in the resolution. It would be better, in his opinion, to have it read, a bill to amend the Militia law. He moved for this alteration. Mr. W. observed, that he thought the law susceptible of several amendments; but with respect to the objection of the gentleman from Maryland, he said it applied with equal force to many other parts of the law, particularly with regard to the general performance of Militia duty.

Mr. LIVERMORE stated some objections to the indefiniteness of the resolution.

Mr. GREENUP observed, that he had seconded the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, because he thought many parts of the law might be amended in such manner, as to make it more applicable to the circumstances of the State of Kentucky; which, from its peculiar situation, could not derive those advantages from the law, which other parts of the Union might; the want of which were sensibly felt. He preferred adopting the words to amend, in lieu of "supplementary."

Mr. HILLHOUSE objected to the motion. He thought that competent relief, in the case complained of, might be obtained from the State Legislature. He added, that the law had scarcely got into operation; some of the States have made provision to carry it into execution; others are about doing the same; and he doubted the policy exceedingly of taking any steps in the matter, before any experience of the law has been had.

Mr. FITZGERALD offered some remarks of a similar nature.

Mr. MERCER supported the motion. He urged a variety of reasons to show the importance of taking immediate measures to amend and ameliorate the law; if this is not done, he said, it will sanction the idea, already entertained by many of the respectable citizens of the Union, that there is a disinclination on the part of many members of the Legislature, to provide for an effective Militia—that a necessity may be induced for a standing army. He adverted to the injustice of the requisition, which enjoins, that a man who is not worth twenty shillings should incur an expense of twenty pounds in equipping himself as a Militia man.

Mr. MURRAY's motion, for a committee, was negatived; fourteen members only rising in the affirmative.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress.

The President's Speech.

Mr. BALDWIN expressed reluctance in being obliged to rise on the present occasion, but the striking out the latter part of the proposition became indispensable, in order to defeat the dangerous doctrine of precedents, and prevent a future plea on the ground of construction. He was aware of the consequences, and that the practice, unless it should be relinquished, would lead to no good. It has been too common, when a certain object is to be carried—to avoid the defeat which a direct attack might produce—to wind round, in order to make its attainment the more certain, by gradual approaches. By one motion, made on doubtful ground, supported by arguments applying to its particular nature, keeping the doubtful tendency out of sight, one step, by the success of the first motion, is made over the true line; another motion follows, backed by the first as a precedent, and a further encroachment is effected, till when it becomes evident, by such gradual encroachments, that they are advancing to dangerous ground; but then, to excuse a further trespass, precedents innumerable, the general nature of which (although hitherto kept out of sight) now become a strong argument against receding.

When gentlemen talk of light and information only, he would agree with them, for he wished to obtain it from every proper source. It has been made the duty of the Executive Departments to give information to the Legislature, but this information should relate, merely, in his opinion, to statements of facts and details of business, but the laws should be framed by the Legislature, after they had acquired this information.

He wished that it might be explicitly and finally determined how far the Legislative business should be solely transacted by the Legislature, and how much be referred to Executive Departments. He conceived there was a solid difference of opinion in the House, on this point, as well as out of doors. Some persons conceive that the more of the affairs of society that are thrown into the hands of individuals, there will be the greater security against error. Whilst, on the other hand, there were many who entertained a contrary opinion, that there is less danger of passion influencing large Legislative bodies, and that the clashing of interests amongst them is a security against partial and improper bias, at the same time that it keeps them more free.

He did not mean to criminate the Treasury Department, but certainly the law which establishes it, is couched in such general language as to afford a latitude for the introduction of new systems, such as were never expected by the Legislature.

He had frequently, on former occasions, remarked, and now repeated it, that the whole of this mode was introduced under cover of referring the petition of the Pennsylvania public creditors (whilst Congress sat at New York) to the Secretary of the Treasury, with directions to report a plan respecting the public credit. But few of the members then suspected, or indeed entertained an idea, that that reference should have produced the plan of the Funding System, or that the Excise would be the consequence.

The impost system which the House originated previous to those plans, was framed upon very different grounds: first principles were adverted to; information was collected from all parts, with great labor. Had the Treasury Department been established then, this information might have been procured with less trouble; but this once collected, the Legislature made use of it, and framed a law, the formation of which has not been unfavorably considered. There is a material distinction between receiving information on which to ground a law, and a plan of the law ready formed. The latter mode he was opposed to. Gentlemen have said that we may reject what is proposed; but in this case we will only be exercising a sort of revisionary power, very different from a Legislative one; a very material difference from what is contemplated in the Constitution—the difference between originating and possessing only the right of a negative.

The House have as much power over the proceedings of the Senate, as over the plan of a law reported by the Secretary. There is but this difference between the cases, that the plans of the Secretary are well supported by argument. And it is to be presumed that he must have been strongly attached to these forms; they had become children of his mind; and it would be found hard to make him change an opinion of a system which he had spent so much time in maturing, although we should conceive them to be originated against the first principles of Government. Indeed, it is a principle itself, that the Legislative and Executive Departments should be kept as far distant as possible. We, whose privilege it is to originate the laws, should have no remote view of advantage. Although it is difficult to amend the defective parts in a complicated system without endangering the uniformity of the whole, yet it is less difficult to put together the parts from collected materials, and to amend a plan before it has been matured.

The objections which he at first entertained to this method of calling for matured plans from the Heads of Departments, were growing every day stronger in his mind. The propriety of keeping the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive powers distinct from each other, is founded in good sense. It is dangerous to intrust those who have a prospect of deriving some advantage in the execution of a law, to have any hand in framing it. And it is as improper for the Legislature to attend to the execution of a law, as it is for the Executive to meddle in the business of legislation. The principle, if once admitted, may be carried to such lengths as to admit the Judiciary to sit in the House of Representatives; and we shall have them here, in their long robes, introducing plans of laws, with the Secretaries of the Treasury and War Departments. The strong sense he had of the necessity of keeping the Departments distinct, had such force upon his mind as to occasion his opposition even to the introduction of the two Secretaries, the other day, to answer interrogatories in the House. Such a precedent, he feared, might prove a dangerous one, and lead to an interference in more important points. He confessed, however, that in some instances the different Departments of Government must necessarily, in some degree, be blended; but he insisted that they should be kept separate as much as possible.

The President's Speech.

Some gentlemen have gone so far as to intimate that the barrier between them is chiefly theoretical, that it is only a paper barrier. To be sure, said he, the barrier laid down in the Constitution for the separation of the Departments, is not a fence to keep out wild beasts, nor a ditch against a savage enemy, nor even like the wall of China, to keep out the Tartars; yet it is not so theoretical as not to be explicitly understood, and we ought to make it as strong and impregnable as if it were a mound.

Experience is strongly in favor of this principle. Both modes of originating laws have been tried; but that system which originated in the House, according to his opinion, had sat well on the feelings of the people, whose interests and wishes, joys and sorrows, must be better known to their Representatives than it is possible for any Executive officer to be acquainted with, in so extensive a country. Had the same principle been followed in the originating of the Excise law, as was in the impost, it would probably have sat better upon the people. His constituents, he contended, had a right to have their feelings represented; and if he found it impracticable to make their voice heard, and sentiments understood with effect in the House, he should consider it his duty to try another mode of forwarding their interests. He would go to where systems originated, and there he would thrust in what information an acquaintance with his constituents put him in possession of, and demand it as a right that their feelings should be consulted. He knew it would be answered, that information was received at the Treasury by private letters and by private conversations. But this was often deceitful information; he knew it to be so in many instances, and that that persons who gave this information would not have readily owned it amongst their neighbors, who might consider that their legal Representatives were the only true sources from which information, concerning their wants or desires, should be derived. If any other mode shall be pursued, it cannot come to good. Upon the whole, he was against the reference, and wished that part of the motion to be struck out.

Mr. WHITE was of the same opinion with Mr. BALDWIN, and spoke against the unqualified practice of giving such extensive powers to the Secretary of the Treasury. The House which will succeed the present will condemn those measures, and he foresaw all these dangers in the second session of the First Congress; that there would hardly be an object of taxation, but what might be thrown into the hands of the Secretary to manage. Indeed, the power given to that officer exceeds the whole powers possessed by the Senate, for their plans do not come accompanied with the improper influence of lengthy argument. He wished, if it were possible, that the House might be left to exercise their own judgments, and that the Secretary should be restricted to the more Executive part of the business of managing the revenue after, and not before, it has been established by the Legislature.

Mr. GILES was sorry to hear this old contest again agitated. He was also against the reference, and lamented the wrong construction which had been put upon the Constitution. He also declared it to be his opinion, that some of the measures recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury discovered a princely ignorance of the country, for the wants and wishes of one part had been sacrificed to the interest of the other.

Mr. MURRAY was in favor of the reference. Mr. GERRY also spoke for it. He read the bill for establishing the Treasury Department, from which he argued that the House was bound, that it was their duty, to refer to the Secretary for plans, &c., and he saw no cause for jealousy, or for any faction to be raised against that officer.

Mr. MERRICK expressed much astonishment that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts should suggest an idea that a faction (as he termed it) could exist in that House against the Secretary of the Treasury; his native manliness of character must have fled before he could admit so humiliating a position. That mind must be degraded without, before it could so far relinquish the self-love and self-esteem ingrafted in our natures, as to descend into a faction against a Secretary. As a citizen of the United States, he felt and acknowledged inferiority to no created being. As one of their Representatives in the Supreme Legislative Council, he considered himself in a situation more responsible, and invested with an authority more important and dignified than that of any Secretary whatever. And whatever might be the opinions of other gentlemen, these impressions should accompany him through every stage of his political conduct; and they would justify the uniform perseverance with which he had and should continue to preserve the full and entire exercise of the powers vested in him by the Constitution. The honorable gentleman had cited a law to enforce this reference. If this was the case, they had no power to deliberate. This surely must be admitted and be unconstitutional. No former Congress could deprive themselves and their successors of this most important of all their powers, and render themselves the cyphers and instruments of an individual. If it gave the Secretary the exclusive right to originate, it was waste, paper, it was nugatory and void; if it did not, he did not see why it should be urged. If it was not wholly exclusive, it ought not to be partially so; for by parting with the power by a reference, it could not be again taken up until a report, which could never make its appearance until accommodated to the wishes of a majority. Those who did not participate in this out-of-doors legislation, were excluded from all the benefits of Government, for a majority once agreed, no representations could break or alter it. He thought himself authorized to say so, from the principles and theory of human nature, and from the practice of the House. But, to lay aside (as he ought to do) cotemporary exposition, and to expound the law by the Constitution, he thought he could reconcile them. The Constitution had divided the delegated powers of the people among the three branches, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, neither of which could alter or transfer the powers so vested. The Legislature was the first, and the source which brought into activity the other two. The law must be made by them; it must be expounded and supplied by the Judiciary, and executed by the Executive; the two last, by the nature of things, flow from, and so far are dependent on the first, as the only source. Thus the Constitution speaks of Heads of Departments and inferior tribunals: it does not describe their duties; when the Legislature describes their duties, they must be expounded as Executive or Judiciary duties, accordingly as they may respect or appertain to either branch. The Heads of the Departments are the inferior organs of the Executive power. The Constitution permits the head of that branch to propose plans; it may be proper, then, that the different Secretaries may prepare such plans as are within their respective Departments, which the Chief Magistrate may propose to the Legislature, if he sees fit; and when so done, it is constitutional, and the Legislature may, or may not, at their discretion, take them up. Any other exposition is unconstitutional and idle. They are also the expositions of the documents and information that arise in the administration of Government which this House may require of the Executive Magistrate, and which he will communicate as he sees fit. The House may go too far in asking information. He may constitutionally deny such information of facts there deputed as are fit to be communicated and may assist in legislation I always wish for. But I want no opinions resulting from him. If they are to influence me, they are wrong; if not to influence, they are useless. This mode of procedure, of originating laws with the Secretary, destroys all responsibility; it throws it on a man not elected by the people, and over whom they have no control. Men will go in a crowd, and glide down a current embarked in a system which no one of them would have dared to propose. That practice has proved the theory, let the Executive law evince. Originating with the Secretary, it met little opposition; and I do not believe that any one member, relying on his individual responsibility to his constituents, would have openly, in this House, originated the design. A cavil, however, is raised on that part of the Constitution which confines the originating money bills to this House exclusively. It is said, by some, a bill is not originated until it has passed the House. Suppose a bill goes through one or two readings here, and is rejected on a third; will any man say, such a bill never originated? Surely the first application of general principles to a particular subject, is the origination, and no subsequent stage can be affixed. Some say the Secretary's Reports are like Smith's Treatise on the Wealth of Nations. We do not come here to go to school, or hear lectures from the Secretaries on finance or any other subject. It would be waste of time to repeat arguments so often and so ably urged. I neither expect nor wish more than temporary expedients from the present representation. I look to the succeeding session, when ultimate and final arrangements, remedying the injustice of the present funding systems and concomitant evils, will take place.

The Militia Law.

After a few words from Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. PAGE, the question for striking out the latter part of the resolution was called for, and there rose in the affirmative 25, and 31 in the negative.

The Committee then rose, reported the resolution, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 21.

A petition of Thomas Faulkner and Edward Faulkner was presented to the House and read, praying that compensation may be made to them out of the unappropriated lands in the Western country, for the quantity to which they are entitled, as refugees from Nova Scotia, under a resolution of the late Congress, of the 13th of April, 1785.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to establish a uniform system on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BOURDINOT, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. GERRY, be the said committee.

THE MILITIA LAW.

Mr. MURRAY called for the resolution which he laid on the table yesterday, "that a committee be appointed to repeal that clause of the Militia law which relates to the arming the Militia;" this being read—

Mr. MURRAY said he still had hopes, though his first motion had failed. The present motion was to repeal the clause which he hoped to prove obnoxious. As it was more limited than the former one, and as he did not mean by this to go into a general revision of the whole law, but confine the repeal and substitute to the arming clause, he imagined many gentlemen would support his intentions, who yesterday were averse to opening the whole law to revision. The clause in question was obnoxious to his constituents; a late and most intimate knowledge of his district had enabled him with great confidence to say so; and he had reason to believe that unless an alteration in the law took place, no act of the Legislature of Maryland would give it the desired operation in that State. The clause was disagreeable to his constituents, because it was oppressive in principle and impracticable in its operation. It was a principle of political justice, which no occasion could dispense with, that protection and taxation should be commensurate. That wherever a tax was levied for the protection of society, its apportionment among individuals should be as exactly as possible correspondent with the property of each individual. There is so much justice in this, that he did not suppose it would be

The Militia Law.

controverted. The oppression that will be felt in the operation of this clause, flows from the violation of that principle. The obligation to arm in a particular manner, as it will produce a uniform expense on men of unequal property, will prove a tax that will act unjustly, because unequally—men will not pay agreeably to their property. To illustrate this is easy, and the plainest mode of showing the truth. By the law, he who has passed his forty-fifth year is exempt from militia duty. It must often happen that men of large fortune will thus contribute nothing towards this species of protection, while the man of very small fortune will be obliged to furnish largely to it, if the father of a family, capable and of age to bear arms. For the sake of harmony and a ready disposition to fall into a patriotic impulse, he much doubted whether his constituents would have murmured much at the violation of the principle; but the impracticability of this clause obliges them to seek relief through their Representatives. The law, in the district he came from, he much feared could not be executed. Each militia-man is to come into the field with a musket or firelock, a bayonet, cartridge-box, and other equipments. These, he verily believed, could not be had. If the citizens—even those who would think lightly of the burden—could not procure these accoutrements, the law must be violated. Congress, he hoped, would not force his well-inclined fellow-citizens to violate the law; but if the law could not possibly be executed, because impracticable, the Legislature would be answerable for the indignities it brought upon itself, by thus prescribing unnecessary hardships.

It was, then, to shield Congress, and the dignity of legislation, from the shame of imposing impossible obligations, as well as to redress the citizen, that he wished the clause altered. Several modes presented themselves. The most obvious is, the furnishing of the arms at the public expense; and another is, the furnishing of the arms to such as might, in the opinion of certain officers, be too poor conveniently to find them. Congress might leave it with either the officers of the militia, or with the deputy marshals. The disposition once felt to relieve, would presently designate its mode of accomplishing redress. Fines, too, would prove a perpetually accumulating fund, which could in a few years either be applied to the further purchase of arms, and further exoneration of the poorer class, who might not fall within the idea of the most rigid poverty, or to a reimbursement of the public for the arms first purchased. At all events, it could do no harm to hear what a committee could report on this subject; and when the House reflected that this was the wish of a populous district, and he verily believed of the whole State of Maryland, he did not doubt of at least a sober regard to such claims. A matter of great importance it certainly was, that, as far as is consistent with the good of the whole, the interests and wishes of a part should be attended to. In this case, his constituents argued from no partial views or local motives, but from the fundamental principles of property and taxation, equally applicable to all who thought themselves aggrieved. He was convinced the clause in question was as impracticable as it was oppressive, and he hoped to have a committee appointed. He felt, that whatever might be the event, he had discharged the duty he owed to his fellow-citizens, and obeyed his own opinions.

Mr. WILLIAMSON strongly reprobated the idea of making the arming of the militia a public expense, as involving a most unequal and oppressive species of taxation, especially as it is conceded that more than one half of the militia are already armed.

Mr. KITTERA said he was opposed to the motion. By a calculation which he offered, he said, the expense of arming the militia at the public charge would amount to forty-two millions of dollars, rating the expense at £20 per man, according to the estimate of a gentleman from Maryland. He reprobated the idea of making any alteration in the law, before any experience of its effects had taken place.

Mr. MERCER supported the estimate he had made of the individual expense; and if it amounted, said he, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, to forty-two millions of dollars, was the expense lessened by its being imposed in the most unequal and oppressive manner? He said he never had any idea of the Government's incurring such an expense. He had no conception of the policy of a militia amounting to seven hundred and fifty thousand men; he never wished to see a militia which should exceed thirty thousand. The plan of arming such an immense mass of militia was, in his opinion, the most absurd idea that could be imagined, and amounted to a relinquishment of all hope of an efficient militia.

Mr. PAGE was opposed to the motion. He objected particularly to Mr. MERCER's idea of arming so small a part of the militia, and pointed out the difficulties which would naturally take place in consequence of different principles being adopted in respect to the arming of the militia. He remarked that the difficulties which had presented themselves in the former discussion of this matter now occurred in full force, and would involve the House in all the perplexities which had heretofore attended the subject.

Mr. DAYTON made a few remarks on the motion. He was opposed to it, and reprobated in strong terms any plan of arming the militia which should give either the State or General Government a right to dispose of their arms on any occasion.

Mr. MURRAY added some further remarks, and then the question was determined in the negative; yeas 6, nays 50, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the President of the UNITED STATES; which were read, as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that provision be made by law for the widows and orphans of those persons who may have been killed while under the protection of flags of truce to the Indian tribes.

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that provision be made by law for the maintenance of the intercourse with foreign nations.

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that measures ought to be taken for the redemption of so much of the public debt as by the act entitled 'An act making provision for the Debt of the United States' and the United States have reserved the right to redeem; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a plan for that purpose.

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the 11th section of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.'

The first and second resolutions were severally again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The third resolution being again read, a motion was made, and, the question being put to amend the same, by striking out the words "and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a plan for that purpose."

Mr. PAGE said a few words on the subject, and denied the charge which had been made by some members against others, when they termed their conduct ministerial opposition.

Mr. LAURANCE spoke for some time in reply to the arguments yesterday adduced by those who had called the mode of referring to the Heads of Departments unconstitutional. He insisted that there was nothing coming from the Secretary of the Treasury which partook of a Legislative quality; and, with regard to the plans heretofore proposed by that officer, he was of opinion that they had met with general approbation, and that they had materially assisted the credit of the United States. Before he sat down he took occasion to inform the House that it was not to be expected that the surplus of the revenue mentioned by the Secretary in his report made at the opening of the present session, would be sufficient for the demands of Government for the year 1793. Other funds must be looked for. His reason for menreposed in us, for obvious reasons, which I will not at this time detain the House with explaining. And indeed the constitutional principles involved in this question have been so very ably investigated already by several gentlemen, that more from me on that ground is not necessary; nor could I improve upon what they have expressed. But an argument of another kind has been frequently repeated, and much urged by the gentleman last up, [Mr. GERRY,] viz: that the law which organizes the Treasury Department has made this mode of originating business our duty; that breaking this law would be setting a dangerous example of disobedience to the citizens, &c. The law in question doubtless gives the Secretary a legal capacity of originating money bills, or plans, and makes it his duty when called upon. How far the law is right is another question. But does the law make it our duty to refer this subject to him? I trust not. Had the last House of Representatives a right to originate revenue systems before this transferring law was enacted? Surely not. Had the House of Representatives power to alienate or abridge our rights? This is the strange doctrine that is avowed, but it is equally extravagant and mistaken. This House has equal powers with that which the first House at any time possessed, and the next House will have as much as this. I have as much power as any other member ever had, and the exercise of that power is only subject to the control of the Constitution and the Rules of Order. Will the gentlemen say that I have not a right just now, or at any time, to propose a plan for the very object in question, or for any other revenue purpose? Yes, sir, I have; and if I have, every other member on this floor has; and if the members individually have the right of proposing an original plan, surely the House in its collective capacity has. It is the members of this House who are sworn to the discharge of this duty, and they only are responsible to their constituents. But we are told that referring to the Secretary renders him responsible. Some have said that it even involves the responsibility of the President. I have sometimes thought that the idea of responsibility was the political idol of the times; however, responsibility properly placed is one of the greatest securities in Government. In the Executive Department much of the duty as well as responsibility of office may be transferred or divided; but in the Legislature, where there can be no transfer of duty or trust, there can be no transfer of responsibility. How can a Secretary be responsible for originating either the substance or form of laws? To whom is he accountable for the discharge of this trust? Not to the President; (by whom he is appointed, and on whom only he is dependent for his continuance in office;) no, for this is not an Executive trust. He is not responsible to the people; he is neither intrusted nor chosen by them. He is not responsible to us, for he is not our officer. It is not he, but us, will bear the blame, while we boast of the security arising from responsibility; by improperly dividing Legislative business, we lose the advantages thereof.

But, passing many arguments worthy of reply, I shall offer a few observations upon what has been much dwelt upon and so often repeated respecting the advantages and disadvantages of the different modes contended for. We are told that referring to the Secretary for revenue systems will secure public credit, by giving stability and system to our revenue, &c.; and the gentleman from New York has told us, that to this method of originating revenue laws, we are indebted for the advantages of our present situation; that we are indebted thereto for our prosperity and wealth. Certainly, if this is true, it proves too much. It proves that we are not capable of discharging the trust reposed in us; in short, that the Republican form of Government under which we are is not suitable for us; if so, it is better to change openly than in this indirect manner. But, Mr. SPEAKER, I ask, if, with all the increase of power and means possessed by the present Government, it is impossible that Congress would not have exercised the powers, nor applied the revenues to proper purposes? Would they have wholly overlooked the contracts and debts of the United States, if the Secretary had not originated the system? Surely this is not a supposable case. I wish he would give a few instances of what we could do; and if we did wrong, the gentlemen would be furnished with new arguments in favor of their plan. But the same gentleman has told us that the Secretary, digesting the plan, has no more influence on the subject than our Clerk's inserting a clause in a bill would have; that they are equally under our control. I think this is not very consistent with the eminent advantages he has suggested that we have derived from the Secretary's origination of revenue plans. However, I apprehend the difference is very great. The Clerk is wholly dependent on us; he has no patronage, no means of influence annexed to his office, nor would he be permitted to intrude his arguments in support of his plans. But, sir, if we are not capable of giving the first form to our revenue systems without such aid, the better way would be to apply for such an amendment to the Constitution as would enable the House of Representatives to appoint an officer wholly dependent on themselves for that purpose. Surely this would be more proper than to employ an Executive officer over whom we have no official control.

Much has been said of the security arising from our own virtue and discernment being a security against undue influence. I have no doubt but the most venal public bodies would boast as much as we; but our own self-confidence will never justify us in breaking down the constitutional guards which suppose a possibility of undue influence, and provides against the appearance of it. But we have been repeatedly charged by the gentleman from Massachusetts with endeavoring to introduce the confusion of the old Government. What confusion does the gentleman mean? Is it a confusion of powers? I grant that, though the old Congress did not possess power enough, yet it possessed, in a degree, every kind of power. This we certainly do not aim at; for it is an unauthorized ized exercise of this confusion of power which we oppose. However, that Government had no efficient revenue powers; and, by the restricted majority necessary to do business with them, and the bad attendance of members, they were perhaps necessarily induced to refer the originating Heads of Departments to the Boards who were of much of their business; from this source I believe it was that the practice was introduced by the new House of Representatives, though the circumstances and powers of the two bodies were essentially different. This method of referring I consider as a part of the confusion of the old Government, which I hope we will no longer tolerate. Surely this method of transferring so influential a part of our Legislative trust was not contemplated by the Convention which formed the Constitution, nor by the State Conventions which adopted it. It is not agreeable to the practice of the State Legislatures, which were the models of the Constitution of the Union; nor is it agreeable to the obvious design of the Constitution itself, or the impressions of the citizens.

Mr. LIVERMORE made some ingenious remarks upon this subject; amongst which, he said that if it was a violation of the Constitution to permit the Executive officers of Government to propose plans, then the President of the United States had been guilty of this breach. He argued ironically, but was against striking out the latter part of the motion.

Mr. GILES and Mr. LAURANCE each rose to explain certain points wherein they had respectively engaged in this debate.

Mr. AMES rose at a late hour in the debate, but before he would pretend to intrude upon the patience of the House, (a motion for taking the question being then under consideration,) he requested to know whether it was most agreeable to put the question? A general desire to hear his arguments, however, prevailed, and he proceeded nearly in substance as follows:

It is so fashionable to introduce the Funding System upon every occasion, it would perhaps appear strange to say that it is out of order upon any. To my mind, and probably to most gentlemen present, it will be difficult to perceive that the question before us bears any relation to that subject, or to the frontier bill, the excise, the perpetual taxes, the encouragement of manufactures, and many other topics, which, somehow or other, have been interwoven with the debate. At this late hour of the day, and in so wearisome a stage of the question, I may be permitted to decline any further notice of these auxiliary subjects.

The great end we have in view is the paying off the Public Debt. This object, truly important in itself, unites the best sense and strongest wishes of the country. It is our duty to provide means for the accomplishment of this end. All agree that a plan is necessary. It must be framed with wisdom and digested with care, so as to operate with the greatest effect, till the whole debt shall be extinguished. The true question is, Which is the best mode of framing this system? Several modes have been preferred by different persons.

Some advocate the appointment of a select committee of this House; others insist that the House in Committee of the Whole is the only proper mode; while others, who defend the original motion, desire to have a plan prepared and submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. It may obviate the force of many of the arguments we have heard to remark, that it is not asserted that either of the several modes is intrinsically incapable of effecting the purpose. It would be improper to say that a select committee could not be formed who would be able to collect the materials for an exact knowledge of the subject, and who, after acquiring that knowledge, would be able to form a sound judgment. Neither would it be just nor respectful to deny, in the abstract, the capability of the House in Committee to digest such a plan. But the question still returns, Which of the three methods is the best to begin with? Neither this House nor a select committee are pretended to be already possessed of the knowledge which is requisite to the framing a system for a Sinking Fund. The very materials from which this knowledge is to be gleaned are not in the possession of this House—they are in the Treasury Department. Neither the curiosity nor the Legislative duty of members lead them to resort daily to the Treasury to investigate official details; and even if it were so, the officer at the Head of the Department, having his mind incessantly occupied with his official business, must be admitted to possess a more familiar and ready, if not a more ample, knowledge of the subject. Indeed, the situation of the Secretary of the Treasury is so evidently favorable to his digesting the plan of a Sinking Fund, that it seems unnecessary to urge it even to those who are opposed to the reference. For their objections imply the preference of the mode, in point of expediency, as strongly as those who explicitly recommend it. They say the plan of the Secretary will come forward with too much advantage. Members, say they, not having the aid of these means of information which the Secretary possesses, will not be able to resist the train of reasoning with which he will introduce his plan. It is even expressly admitted that the information of the Treasury Department is necessary, and must be called for; but they would not receive it with the reasoning of the Secretary. Without wasting time to prove this point, common sense will decide instantly that the knowledge of our financial affairs, and of the means of improving them, is to be obtained the most accurately from the officer whose duty it is made, by our own law, to understand them; who is appointed and commissioned for that very purpose; and to whom every day's practice in his office must afford some additional information of official details, as well as of the operation of the laws. The arguments on both sides end in the same point, that the information of the Secretary would be useful. Our object being to prefer that mode of preparing a plan which is adapted to present us the best, the argument might end here, if it were not that the Constitution is alleged to forbid our resorting to the Secretary. I reverence the Constitution, and I readily admit that the frequent appeal to that as a standard proceeds from a respectful attachment to it. So far it is a source of agreeable reflection. But I feel very different emotions when I find it almost daily resorted to on questions of little importance, when, by strained and fanciful constructions, it is made an instrument of casuistry. It is to be feared it may lose something in our minds in point of certainty, and more in point of dignity.

And what is the clause of the Constitution opposed to the receiving a plan of a Sinking Fund from the Secretary? Bills for raising revenue shall originate in this House. I verily believe the members of this House, and the citizens at large, would be very much surprised to hear this clause of the Constitution formally and gravely stated as repugnant to the reference to the Treasury Department for a plan, if they and we had not been long used to hear it.

To determine the force of this amazing constitutional objection, it will be sufficient to define terms. What is a bill? It is a term of technical import, and surely it cannot need a definition; it is an act in an inchoate state, having the form but not the authority of a law. What is originating a bill? Our Rules decide it. Every bill shall be introduced by a motion for leave, or by a committee.

It may be said the plan of a Sinking Fund, reported by the Secretary, is not in technical, or even in popular language, a bill—not by the Rules of the House or those of common sense is this motion the originating a bill. By resorting to the spirit of the Constitution, or by adopting any reasonable construction of the clause, is it possible to make it appear repugnant to the proposition for referring to the Secretary? The opposers of this proposition surely will not adopt a construction of the Constitution. They have often told us we are to be guided by a strict adherence to the letter; that there is no end to the danger of constructions. The letter is not repugnant; and will be seriously affirmed that, according to the spirit and natural meaning of the Constitution, the Report of the Secretary will be a revenue bill, or any other bill, and that this proposition is originating such a bill? If it be, where shall we stop? If the idea of a measure which first passes through the mind be confounded with the measure subsequent to it, what confusion will ensue! The President, by suggesting the proposition, may as well be pretended to originate a revenue bill; even a newspaper plan would be a breach of the exclusive privilege of this House; and the liberty of the press, so justly dear to us, would be found unconstitutional. Yet, if, without any order of the House, the draft of an act were printed, and a copy laid before every member in his seat, no person will venture to say that it is a bill, that it is originated, or can be brought under the cognizance of the House, unless by a motion in conformity to the Rules and Orders. The Report of the Secretary in regard to manufactures, so often adverted to, has not yet been acted upon; does that appear on our Journals as a bill? Language has not yet been perverted to such a degree as to assert any such thing; and yet the constitutional objection implies opinions no less. I rely upon it, that neither the letter of the Constitution, nor any meaning that it can be tortured into, will support the objection which has been so often urged with solemn emphasis and persevering zeal.

If the Constitution be admitted, therefore, to authorize the reference to the Secretary, why should not the mode which is proved to be the most expedient be immediately adopted? Here we meet another objection. It is said, that the Legislative and Executive branches of Government are to be kept distinct, and this reference will produce an improper blending of them. It is a truth that these Departments are to be kept distinct; but the conclusion drawn from it is altogether vague. The execution of every trust requires some deliberation, and many of them call into action the highest powers of the human mind, and the most intense and persevering application of them; yet these trusts are to be Executively performed, and it by no means follows, that the officer charged with them invades the deliberative functions of Congress. On the other hand, many laws are the result of plain principles or parts of the Constitution, and Congress, by enacting them, only executes the Constitution. Yet, here is no encroachment upon the Executive branch. The truth is, the Constitution has allotted powers to the several branches of the Government, and by that rule we are to judge of their several limits. The President proposes measures to the Legislature, in conformity to the Constitution; yet no one ever supposed that his doing so is a departure from a just theory; not has it, as far as I know, been ever insinuated till of late, in this or any other country, that the calling for information from officers, any more than the calling for testimony from witnesses, amounts to a transfer of our Legislative duty. It is very easy to conceive how much increased information may aid us in deliberating, but it is hard to discern how we are to profit by the want of it. It is true it is our peculiar province to deliberate, but neither the letter of the Constitution, nor the law establishing the Treasury Department, nor the reason of the case, have restrained us from calling for official information. It is not true in fact, that the deliberative and Executive Departments are blended by referring to the Secretary. Any objections deduced from an over-refining theory, and not warranted by the Constitution, might need an answer if we were now framing a Government, but can have no force in the administration of one. Indeed, it is a very scholastic, and very imposing mistake, to abandon the letter and meaning of the plan of Government we act under, and to undertake to reason independently, as if we were now settling the institutes of a political treatise.

The expediency of this question of referring to the Secretary, which is brought into dispute, involves many others which will admit of none. In framing the plan of a Sinking Fund is the officer at the head of our finances to have any agency? If he said he is not, then, it may be demanded, why is an idle officer and an useless office kept up? The sense of mankind as well as the practice of nations, seems to show that where there are finances there should be a financier; that he should possess at least common talents, and more than common industry in the application of them to his duty.

This is not a point to be proved now for the first time. The law of the old Congress and their practice were conformable to this motion. We hear often of the people being opposed to these references. So far as I have been informed the opposition is a novelty. The law establishing the Treasury Department, passed by a great majority, expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary to prepare and report plans of finance. Scarce a whisper of objection was then heard in the House, and not one, I believe, in the country. Our own practice of referring has passed unresisted till of late. Gentlemen now opposed to this reference, in one instance, if I recollect rightly, referred to the Attorney General to revise a plan of the Judicial Department, and on another to require the Secretary of State to report on the means for improving our trade and navigation. These objects partake as much of legislation, and are as incommunicable as the subject of discussion. The former votes and arguments of gentlemen opposed to the present reference, afford some proof of its fitness as well as constitutionality.

The intrinsic reasonableness of this practice is not less than its authority from law and precedent, and what is more, the precedent of its opposers. Private affairs prosper by skill, economy, and industry, in the management of them. The finances of a nation, though infinitely more important, require nothing more than economy upon a great scale. Let the moneyed affairs of a country be made everybody's business, and nobody will do it. Would you have them prosper, let them be confided to one man, who, however, shall be under the strict control of the law, and rigidly responsible for his doings. That man, if he loves an honest reputation as much as a man of common sense and feeling may be expected to do, will make the public business his own; he will put his character at risk: his time and all his talents will be devoted to the public. Such will be his dispositions; now what will he have, at one view before him, the whole arrangements of finance: the imports and exports, the receipts and expenditures, the operation of the law, the means of improving it; the frauds committed or attempted on the revenue, and the checks to guard it: the well founded objections against the law and the prejudices which time or conciliatory conduct may efface, the appropriations of the revenue—the places where and terms on which loans may be obtained, as well as the state of foreign trade; the regulations of foreign nations, and perhaps it may be added, in subordination to the Chief Magistrate, the state of treaties and negotiations. It will be seen that the ordinary discharge of his duty, as well as that which will oblige him sometimes to conflict against prejudices, and sometimes against fraud, will render the details of finance familiar to him, and will almost force him to adopt plans for reducing this great mass into system and order.

Is it to be denied that in consequence he will possess some means of information which this House or a committee must acquire only by slow and laborious investigation? In pursuing it the time might fail, and the materials get confused. Yet, allowing it effected, they have gained no more than it is his duty to furnish on the order of this House, and this is what we are contending for. If we call for it and he is not able to give it, we shall thus expose his incapacity or negligence. The public opinion, thus enlightened, will soon displace the officer, and a fitter man will succeed him. In this way, the people will exercise an effective control over their servants.

Be the information given by the officer what it may, the sources from which his inferences are drawn, his facts and reasonings, are publicly exposed. They are equally in possession of every member, who is thus placed on an equal, and on the best footing to attack or defend the report. As much cannot be said of the report of a select committee or a Committee of the Whole. It has been intimated, that in framing a report, the Secretary would be liable to misinformation, to some local or other attachments. This is possible, for he is a man; but will the Committee be free from it? The Secretary is answerable for his conduct to the nation, and certainly he is not more subject to local partialities than members are to their respective districts. The advantage of impartiality in the first concoction of a report seems to be evidently in favor of a reference.

It has been said, on the other side, information may be wanted, it is true, from the Secretary; but let the House first make progress in the business, and then receive it by a committee advising with the Secretary. If this may be done, what becomes of the constitutional difficulties and all we have heard of the transfer of our deliberative power?

But, if we are to have the official information, why should we set out without it? Why should it not be given openly, so as to put all the members on an equality, and before prepossessions are formed with regard to plans, which might make a late report from the Treasury appear to come in aid of one party or another? Would the style of declamation be less vehement against the secret communications of a Secretary with the Committee, than against a report made in the face of day, and subject to the criticism not only of this House, but of an enlightened nation?

It is not my present design to ask for what purpose of argument or of candor it is so often insinuated, that the question really is, whether this House shall legislate, or whether it shall transfer the power of making laws to the Secretary of the Treasury?

With all this official information previously before us, are we less qualified or worse disposed to deliberate? It would be extravagant to affirm that, in proportion as our means of information are made complete, we are worse situated to legislate; and, as to the spirit of inquiry, I do not remember that the reports of the Secretary have blunted it. From the manner in which they have been discussed heretofore, those gentlemen will confide in the assurance I venture to give them, that they will be thoroughly sifted. They have not always passed unaltered, and never without passing through the fire of a debate.

We may repeat it, therefore, what color is there for saying that the Secretary legislates? Neither my memory nor my understanding can discern any. I am well aware that no topic is better calculated to make popular impressions; but I cannot persuade myself that the people will charge us with neglect or violation of duty, for putting ourselves into a situation to discharge it in the best and most circumspet manner.

There is another ground of objection, which is urged against the reference. It is said, it gives undue influence to the Treasury. The reasonings of the Secretary, which accompany his reports, are alleged to excite an influence which cannot be resisted. There are two sorts of influence; one, which arises from weight of reason and the intrinsic merit of a proposition; the other, personal influence. As to the former, it is hard to conceive of the influence of reasoning which cannot be analyzed and made capable of exact estimation by the reasoning faculties of those to whom it is submitted; and that estimation, be it what it may, ought to obtain. No one can wish to see it underrated.

But we are told by the opposers of a reference, that it is incredible that one man, be his official opportunities what they may, should possess more information than the members of this House, collected from every district of the country. Then I answer, with inferior information, it would be impossible his superior information of the House. The members will be in the less danger from this officer, if, as we are told, he is misinformed by correspondents, and has repeatedly discovered on subjects of revenue and finance, a princely ignorance. This, we are told, however, by gentlemen who urge the danger of losing our independence and our faculties of discernment, as soon as we suffer a report, with its reasonings, to be made to the House.

If it be personal influence, independently of reason and evidence, which is apprehended by gentlemen opposed to the reference, for whom do they apprehend it? For themselves, or for us who advocate the motion? Surely, if they do not feel, we do not fear it; we know how to respect their independence of spirit; they would disdain an imputation of the sort; their candor will permit us to say, if it be a neighborly concern they feel for us, there is no occasion for it.

On the whole, if we regard the Constitution, we find not the least color for bringing it into question on this debate. The law and usage of the old Congress corresponded with this motion. Our own Treasury law expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary to prepare and report plans; and shall the practice of one branch run counter to that which is made the course of his duty by the law of the land? It would be an uncommon and very irregular mode of repealing a law. The advantages of this practice of referring, are manifest and great: more information is obtained, and more order, intelligence, and system, are preserved in the administration of the finances. The old Congress and the several States have exhibited expensive and deplorable proofs of the evils incident to want of order, as well as to the number of systems of finance and financiers. With this mass of evidence before our eyes, it cannot be believed that we shall take any step which will tend to introduce disorder and inefficiency into our finances.

Mr. Madison closed the debate with a few powerful observations. He insisted that a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury on subjects of loans, taxes, and provision for loans, &c., was, in fact, a delegation of the authority of the Legislature, although it would admit of much sophistical argument to the contrary. The arguments which he had heard, he said, were not satisfactory to his mind; and he peremptorily denied that the plans of that officer came into the House in either an equitable or unbiased manner. A plan from the Senate might fairly be styled a constitutional one, because it came unsupported by any labored train of argument, and left the House at liberty to exercise its judgment pro and con, whilst those of the Secretary of the Treasury were accompanied by a force of reasoning not on both sides, but on one only. This, he insisted, was in opposition to Mr. Ames's doctrine; and, after making a few other remarks, concluded by declaring that it was evident the Secretary's plans were not introduced in such manner as to leave the House the freedom of exercising their own understandings in a proper constitutional manner.

When Mr. Madison sat down, the question was taken on striking out the latter part of the motion, to wit: for referring to the Secretary of the Treasury to report a plan, &c., and it passed in the negative—yeas 25, nays 32, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittara, John Laurence, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Mul-lenberg, William Vans Murray, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, and Artemas Ward.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said third resolution, as reported by the Committee of the Whole House, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Registering of Vessels.

THURSDAY, November 22.

Another member, to wit, JOHN MILLEDGE, returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia in the room of ANTHONY WAYNE, whose seat was declared vacant, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded to consider the fourth resolution reported on Tuesday last by the Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the President of the UNITED STATES; and the same being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the Subscribers to the Bank of the United States.'"

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the first resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole House and agreed to yesterday, and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. MACON, and Mr. HEISTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the second resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole House and agreed to yesterday, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. LEARNER, do prepare and bring in the same.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, with an abstract of a supplementary arrangement which has been made by him, pursuant to the acts of the 3d day of March, 1791, and the 8th day of May, 1792, for raising a revenue upon foreign and domestic distilled spirits, in respect to the subdivisions and officers which have appeared to him necessary, and to the allowances for their respective services to the Supervisors, Inspectors, and other officers of inspection, together with estimates of the amount of compensations and charges.

The said Message, and papers therein referred to, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury containing estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1793, which lay on the table, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Joseph Henderson; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Report under consideration, and made some progress therein.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further proceeding on the said Report, and that it be committed to Mr. AMES, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. CLARK, with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians, and that Mr. AMES, Mr. TUCKER, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his Reports on sundry petitions; which were severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REGISTERING OF VESSELS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels:

Mr. PAGE opposed the clause which referred to "ships or vessels captured in war." He moved that it should be struck out, as countenancing a savage practice, now exploded and laid aside by civilized nations; that it would be time enough when the United States shall be so unfortunate as to be involved in a war, to make provision for the case now alluded to; that no inconvenience could arise from adopting the motion; that indeed it highly became the Legislature of the United States to adopt it, as they would thereby show their approbation of the liberal and benevolent sentiments now adopted by the greatest and most enlightened nations of Europe, abolishing the inhuman practice. That he supposed the clause had been inserted in the bill, because it was drawn before this circumstance of the benevolent disposition of the nations of Europe were generally known. He hoped therefore that his motion would be agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER seconded the motion, and supported it by arguments similar to Mr. PAGE's; remarking, that the French nation, though now engaged in an extensive war, did not permit the capture of merchant vessels; prohibiting that practice as inhuman and unbecoming a civilized nation.

Mr. GOODHUE, in reply, said, that the motion seemed to look to a state of perpetual peace, but for his part, as he did not think the millennium was begun, he should vote against the motion.

Mr. PAGE replied, that he did not expect the millennium in his day any more than the gentleman did who had endeavored to ridicule his motion. That he was not a little surprised to find that a motion which had a tendency so benevolent, and was in itself so rational, expressed too with modesty and deference to the framers of the bill, should meet with such a reception. He then repeated the substance of what he had before said, as he supposed he had not been heard, and insisted on it that the clause he moved to be struck out was not not only unnecessary in the bill, but was an improper adoption of a practice now condemned as savage by the enlightened nations of the world.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked in opposition to the motion, that the clause ought not to be struck out, because it was not confined to merchant vessels which might be captured, but extended to ships of war, which, if taken by the United States in any future war, ought certainly to come within the view and benefit of the act.

The question was then put, and carried in the negative without a division.

NOVEMBER, 1792.]

Foreign Coins.

[H. OF R.]

When the bill was reported, Mr. PAGE renewed his motion for striking out the clause, &c., repeating nearly his former arguments, adding that as to the objection made to his motion on account of its interfering with the case of ships of war which may be captured. He said he felt for the United States when such a case was mentioned; he felt himself depressed and dispirited at the idea of his country being so perplexed by the expenses of a trifling war with the Indians, and yet looking forward to the capture of ships of war. That surely if that be the object of the clause, as it looks to a case which cannot happen till a future distant day, it will be time enough for some future Legislature to consider it; that for his part, he hoped never to see the United States possessed of a navy; at all events, till they had one, it would be unnecessary to make regulations respecting their prizes. He assured the House, he would not have renewed his motion, if he did not think it his duty to persist in his attempt to show the propriety of uniting in sentiments and endeavors with the great enlightened nations of the world, to put a stop to a savage practice which had been too often a great inducement to enter into wars. He wished to take away every possible temptation to enter into a war, and whenever his country should be so unhappy as to be involved in one, he wished, by the amendment proposed, to lessen the number of unavoidable evils attending wars.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

FRIDAY, November 23.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians; which was received, and read the first time.

FOREIGN COINS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes."

Mr. PAGE said, he wished to be informed whether there really was the difference between the French and British coins stated in the bill; if so, how that difference has been ascertained. That a few years since he had examined hydrostatically the different gold coins named in the bill, and a variety of coins of the German Empire; and that although he readily discovered that the specific gravity of the latter was so little as to justify the low value at which they were generally rated, he remembered well, that there was by no means such difference between the specific gravity of the former as could justify the discrimination made in the bill. He added, that he doubted whether, if there really should appear to be that difference between the coins, it would be proper to introduce the distinction by a law of the General Government, as it might be attended with some inconveniences, and might be construed into a partiality to British commerce. He therefore, to take the sense of the Committee, moved to amend the clause, so as that the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, should be payable at the same rates.

Mr. TUCKER seconded Mr. PAGE, and supported his motion with similar arguments.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he should vote against the amendment, because, he believed that the distinction proposed in the bill was really that which did exist in the intrinsic value of the coins alluded to.

Several other members opposed the motion, because, said they, we have no doubt that the Senate, who originated the bill, had considered the subject fully, and had made the proper estimate, on full information, of the real value of the different coins.

Mr. PAGE replied, that since he had only heard the opinions and suppositions of gentlemen opposed to his opinion, and no satisfactory proof offered to support the bill against his amendment, he should persist in his motion; for, said he, although I will not be so dogmatical as to assert that I am right, and the Senate wrong; yet, in a matter of this nature, which admits of positive proof and demonstration, and which, as far as my own actual experiments have gone, establish my opinion, I cannot give it up, till I have been convinced by other arguments than such as I have heard. Had I been told that the different coins alluded to had been examined hydrostatically, or had been assayed by proper persons appointed for that purpose, I should have acquiesced. I might possibly, however, have supposed that they were of a different coinage or emission from those which I had examined. I think the clause under consideration is of such importance as to require full and satisfactory proof to the world, that it has not been adopted without a thorough investigation of the truth and propriety of the discrimination it establishes between the coins of the nations with which we have such a considerable commercial intercourse. With that proof, I should be satisfied, and would defy the invidious suspicion of our being influenced by improper motives; but till such proof be afforded, I must think it would be better to amend the bill as I proposed, which would leave those coins on their present footing during only the short term to which their circulation is limited by the bill.

From what fell from some gentlemen, he said, it appeared that they thought the examination of the relative value of coins could only be ascertained by an assayer. He affirmed that any person acquainted with the use of an hydrostatic balance might easily examine them. That it was with reluctance he said any thing which might look like a scientific parade, but he thought it his duty to bring forward the inquiry he made; and what had fallen from some gentlemen compelled him to explain and support his motion.

To explain what he had said respecting the hydrostatic experiment, he observed, that it had pleased Nature, or rather the Great Author of Nature, to annex to most bodies, and particularly to metal, a different weight. Happily each species of substances have different weights, which, with propriety, are called specific gravities. That, most happily for our purpose, a cubic foot of water weighs 1,000 oz. avoirdupois; and a body when immersed in water, displaces a mass of water equal to the bulk of the immersed body; in displacing which mass of water, the body, if suspended to a pair of scales, is found to lose a weight exactly equal to the weight of the mass of water so displaced; so that, if any piece of money be weighed first in air, and then in water, its loss of weight in water will be exactly the weight of an equal bulk of water, which must at once give the comparative weight of that piece of money and of water. And as by this method pure gold has been found to be about nineteen times heavier than water, and copper nine times, which has been generally the alloy used in gold coins, if copper be mixed in any proportion (or any other metal whose specific gravity is known) the specific gravity of the compound may be found, and the exact proportion of each ingredient ascertained; and here I will regulate the coins of the United States, the proportion of silver and copper, which are declared to be the composition of the alloy for our gold coins, is not exactly fixed; there must be a difficulty of finding the real value of that coin without an actual and accurate assay, and also room for varying its value. But, as this is happily left to the discretion of the Director of the Mint, whose abilities, accuracy, and integrity, are so remarkable, no inconvenience need be apprehended, as there is no doubt that he will observe the trust reposed in him, and that he will point out, from time to time, the exact proportion of these two ingredients of the alloy, which are left by the bill to his discretion. This I looked upon as a defect in the bill, and mentioned when it was before us the last session, as a reason why I wished to have it recommitted; but to return to the question. As I have found that the specific gravity of the gold coins of England, France, Spain, and Portugal, was, as well as I can now remember, about seventeen and an half, and that of some German coins not fifteen; that is, that the former weighed seventeen and a half times more than an equal mass of water, and the latter not fifteen times as much, or, in other words, that a cubic foot of the former weighed 17,500 oz. whilst a cubic foot of the latter would not weigh 15,000—I say, as I have found this to be the case, I wish to know now whether any later experiments on those coins have been made to prove that there is a difference stated in the bill; if there have been, such experiments I shall withdraw my motion, if not, I must insist upon it.

MONDAY, November 26.

JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from Connecticut, appeared, and took his seat.
A bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.
An engrossed bill concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels was read the third time, and passed.

A petition of sundry masters and owners of coasting vessels, and others, trading between the ports of New London and New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that the tonnage and fees of office imposed on vessels employed in the coasting trade, may be lessened.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for regulating ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries.

A petition of John Manley was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed the prize money on certain British ships captured by the petitioner, while a Captain in the Navy of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of War, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.
A memorial and representation of Warner Mifflin, one of the people called Quakers, was presented to the House and read, stating certain reflections for the consideration of Congress, in relation to the African slave trade, and to the humane treatment of slaves in the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorial and representation do lie on the table.
Resolved, That the Commissioners for the settlement of the accounts between the individual States and the United States, report to the House the time at which they suppose they will be ready to make their final report; and whether any, and what, obstacles remain, to prevent such final report.

TUESDAY, November 27.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings, in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service," which was received, and read twice, and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels, to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, covering a petition of a number of inhabitants of St. Vincennes, on the Wabash, praying that the survey of their lands, directed by a late law, may be made at the public expense; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MUNDENBERG, and Mr. LEONARD, with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting lost and destroyed certificates; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, November 28.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills granting farther compensation to certain Receivers of Continental Taxes; and that Mr. GILES, Mr. SHEARJAH-BURN, and Mr. SYLVESTER, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 9th instant, together with the papers accompanying the same, on the subject of the boundary between the State of Virginia and the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio; whereupon,

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested and authorized, with the concurrence of the States of Virginia and Kentucky, to cause the line to be extended from the western termination of the line formerly run by Fry and Jefferson, on the part of Virginia, and by other surveyors on the part of North Carolina, by a surveyor of sufficient abilities, in the proper latitude, whereby the northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina may be determined; and that Congress will provide for the necessary expense attending the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. BOUNDARY, Mr. WILLIAMSON, and Mr. PAGE, prepare and bring in the same.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," together with the amendments thereto, was read the third time; and, on a motion made and seconded, Ordered, To be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House on the first Monday of January next.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill granting farther compensation to certain Receivers of Continental Taxes; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was read.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

WARNER MIFFLIN'S PETITION.

Mr. STEELE called the attention of the House to the memorial and representation of Warner Mifflin on the subject of Negro slavery. Mr. S. said, that after what had passed at New York on this subject, he had hoped the House would have heard no more of it; but, to his surprise, he found the subject was started anew, and had been introduced by a fanatic, who, not content with keeping his own conscience, undertook to become the keeper of the consciences of other men, and in a manner which he deemed not very decent, had intrusted his opinions into this House. Had an application been made to him to present such a petition, he thought he should have avoided a compliance with it. Gentlemen in the Northern States do not realize the mischievous consequences which have already resulted from measures of this kind, and if a stop were not put to such proceedings, the Southern States would be compelled to apply to the General Government for their interference. He concluded, by moving "that the paper purporting to be a petition from Warner Mifflin, be returned to him by the Clerk of the House; and that the entry of said petition be expunged from the Journal."

Mr. AMES rose to explain his motives in presenting the petition. He said it was his opinion, which he had expressed to the House long ago, that this Government could not, with propriety, take any steps in the matter referred to in this petition; but, on the general principle, that every citizen has a right to petition the Legislature, and to apply to any member to present his request to the House, he had handed it in. The petitioner is a citizen of Delaware; and had the member from that State been in the House, he should not have thought himself obliged to have introduced it; but that gentleman being absent, the petitioner had a right to apply to a member from any other State. He had no idea of supporting the prayer of the petition, his mind having been long made up on the subject. He considered it as totally inexpedient to interfere with the subject, and had uniformly opposed the applications made at a former session of Congress.

Mr. LIVERMORE did not consider the motion in order, the subject not being properly before the House; nor did he believe there was any disposition to bring it forward.

Mr. W. SMITH said he had seconded the motion, with a view of putting it out of the power of any member to call it up when persons might be absent who would find it their duty to oppose it. Mr. S. said he admitted, in its full extent, the right of every citizen to petition for a redress of grievances, and the duty of the House to consider such petitions; but the paper in question is a mere rant and rhapsody of a meddling fanatic, interlarded with texts of Scripture, and concluded with no specific prayer. He observed it was the general practice of Legislative bodies for members presenting petitions to read them, in order to make known their objects, and to have them entered on the Journal. In this particular instance, the practice might be attended with danger. Citizens of the Southern States learning that papers of this kind meet with countenance here, would be alarmed. The gentleman who presented this paper had not, on this occasion, shown his usual regard to Southern interests. Had he stated its dangerous object, the House would undoubtedly have refused its reception. After the proceedings at New York, when a similar application was made, his constituents had a right to expect that the subject would never be stirred again. He would assure the House, that while he continued a member of it, he should never fail to express his abhorrence against all such applications, as they could have none but a mischievous tendency. So far from being calculated to meliorate the condition of the race who were the object of them, they had a tendency to alienate their affections from their masters, and by exciting in them a spirit of restlessness, to render greater severity towards them necessary. He therefore earnestly called on the House to agree to the motion, and thereby convince this enthusiast, and others, that they can never meet countenance in the Legislature of the Union. The part of the motion directing the petition to be returned by the Clerk was agreed to. The remainder was withdrawn by Mr. STEELE, the mover.

THURSDAY, November 29.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the first of July to the thirtieth of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, inclusive; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Lewis Garanger, in behalf of himself and his brother, Charles Garanger: whereupon,

Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be empowered and directed to adjust and settle the accounts of Lewis Garanger, as a Captain of Artillery, from the twenty-ninth of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, until the establishment of peace.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. WILLIAMSON, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

On a motion made and seconded, Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause assays and other proper experiments to be made, at the Mint of the United States, of the gold and silver coins of France, England, Spain, and Portugal; and a report of the quantity of fine metal, and of alloy, in each of the denominations of the coins, to be laid before this House.

Ordered, That the said resolution be transmitted to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by the SPEAKER.

FRIDAY, November 30.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the executors of Edward Carnes, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, measures are necessary to facilitate the settlement of claims against the United States, not barred by acts of limitation, founded upon certificates granted, or settlements made, by any officer or officers, heretofore authorized by the United States to issue certificates or make settlements in their behalf; and who have not settled their accounts; and to report the result of their inquiries."

Ordered, That Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. NILES, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to amend the act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States, so far as respects the copper coinage; and that Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. KIRKPA, be the said committee.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made a farther progress therein.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House the accounts of the Commissioners of Loans, for the current year, by which his estimate is formed for appropriating thirty-five thousand and sixty-three dollars and twenty-eight cents, for the salaries of clerks and for stationery, in the Loan Offices of the United States, to the thirty-first of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

MONDAY, December 3.

Ordered, That the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims, which was presented to this House on the 8th ultimo, be referred to Mr. KEY, Mr.

GROVE, and Mr. TUCKER, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report of a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, and for the reimbursement of a certain loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the orders of the 21st and 22d ultimo; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of sundry merchants and traders, inhabitants of the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, stating the disadvantages under which they labor, for the want of a bankrupt law, and praying that Congress will take the subject into consideration, and pass an act thereupon.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to establish an uniform system on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; which was read the first time.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a list of the names of the persons returned to his office for pensions, by the Circuit Courts, in pursuance of the act entitled, "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the rates of Invalid Pensions," together with the rates of the said pensions, and the causes assigned for disability, accompanied with a statement of such facts and circumstances as may relate thereto.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman rose and reported progress.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. DAYTON's motion, laid on the table on Friday last, was called up by that gentleman, viz:

"That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a list of the names of the persons returned to his office for pensions, by the Circuit Courts, in pursuance of the act, entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the rates of Invalid Pensions,' together with the rates of said pensions, and the causes assigned for disability, accompanied with a statement of such facts and circumstances as may relate thereto."

Mr. DAYTON observed, that he considered it the indispensable duty of the Legislature to inquire into this subject, in order to avoid imposition. He held a paper in his hand containing an account of a number of persons admitted on the pension list by the Circuit Courts, on account of complaints, which if they were generally admitted, would increase the pension list in such manner, as ten times the present revenue of the United States would not be adequate to supporting.

Mr. B. BOURNE observed, that the Government had vested a discretionary power with the Secretary of War to check the grant of pensions in improper cases; that the Secretary was preparing a report on this subject; and that a full statement of the whole matter would be laid before the House. He therefore saw no necessity for the resolution.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, he hoped nothing was intended by the motion to counteract the benevolent views of the Legislature, in the only act of Legislative generosity ever exhibited by this Government, the law of the last session making particular provision for invalids. Mr. S. said, he thought the necessary information on the subject would come before the House in course; but he was anxious that no steps should be taken, on account of some improper grants of pensions, to frustrate the designs of Government, or divert the justice and humanity of the country from a class of citizens who have fought the battles of the Union and to whom the United States are so much indebted for their present freedom and happiness.

Mr. CLARK, Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. HULLHOUSE, supported the motion. It was said that the law was found inadequate to the purpose for which it was made; that while in some cases it was not carried into execution, in others very improper grants of pensions had been made. Information was wanted; this information may be obtained; the law is defective, and ought to be revised. Justice, therefore, to real objects, to guard against impositions, and to make that provision which the finances of the country are competent to, impose a necessity that the motion should be adopted. In reply to the objection, that information would come in of course from the War Office, it was said, the motion went to several points, on which it was not the duty of the Secretary to report, unless he was required to do it.

TUESDAY, December 4.

A bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the Register's detail of the estimate of thirty-five thousand and sixty-three dollars and twenty-eight cents, for the clerk hire and stationery of the several Loan Offices of the United States, to the thirty-first of March next, made pursuant to the order of Friday last; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, to whom are referred the estimates of appropriation for the current year.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three. The papers on which the estimate of the expense of the Loan Office was founded, were read.

The accounts of the Loan Office of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, were particularly called for, and read in detail. The expenses of these offices were very different, owing to the business being much greater, by reason of transfers, in some States than in others. The amount of the expense was generally complained of. It was observed that some other mode of doing the business ought to be adopted, or, that those for whose advantage these numerous transfers are made, should bear a due proportion of the expense occasioned thereby. Several alterations or corrections were made in the estimate respecting this article.

The sum of fifty thousand dollars for the contingencies and incidental expenses of the War Department, having been struck out, Mr. STEELE moved that the blank be filled with five thousand dollars.

This motion was withdrawn, and was succeeded by another, to the following purport: "That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before the House a statement of the items constituting the sum in the estimate proposed to be appropriated for contingent, incidental, and conjectural charges in the War Department." This motion was objected to as informal in itself, and contrary to the practice of the House; it was urged that the proper mode would be to call on the officer at the head of the War Department, to lay before the House the necessary documents. It was accordingly moved that the words "the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES" be struck out of the motion, and that the Secretary of War should be directed to lay before the House, &c. The motion for striking out was lost; and then the question on the motion as originally made, was put and carried.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of the 7th ultimo as relates to a statement of the administration of the fund appropriated to certain Foreign purposes, together with the papers accompanying the same, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EXPENSES OF THE CREEK TREATY.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House the 28th ultimo, to the bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of peace with the Creek Indians: whereupon,

The question being taken, that the House do concur with the Committee in the said amendment for filling up the blank in the said bill with the words "twelve thousand dollars,"—it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 25, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clarke, Jonathan Dayton, William B. Giles, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, William Barry Grove, James Hillhouse, Israel Jacobs, Aaron Kitchell, Richard Bland Lee, Samuel Livermore, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, John Steele, Thomas Sumpter, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

And then, a motion being made, and the question put, to fill up the said blank with the words "nine hundred dollars," it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

An engrossed bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians was read the third time; and, on the question that the said bill do pass, it passed in the negative—yeas 20, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Thomas Fitzsimons, John Laurance, Samuel Livermore, John Milledge, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, John Page, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, James Gordon, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, George Leonard, John Francis Mercer, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, John Steele, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, and Hugh Williamson.

And so the bill was rejected.

PETITION OF MOSES YOUNG.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the memorial of Moses Young. Whereupon,

The resolution reported by the said committee, in the words following, was read, to wit:

"That the said Moses Young hath a just claim on the United States for the full amount of his salary, at the rate of five hundred pounds sterling per annum, from the eighteenth of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine, to the thirtieth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, including the usual allowance of three months for returning to America; and that, after deducting the sums received from Doctor Franklin, and by his attorney, Joseph Nourse, the balance ought to be paid by the United States."

The facts of the case are these: Mr. Young was appointed Secretary to Mr. Laurens on his embassy to Holland. Mr. Laurens, it appears, had recommended to Mr. Young to take but one half of his salary, in consideration of the embassy's having proved inefficient; and, as an inducement, informed Mr. Young that he (Mr. Laurens) intended to relinquish the whole of his salary. Mr. Young, from patriotic motives, and influenced by the example of Mr. Laurens, accordingly relinquished one half of his salary as Secretary aforesaid; but finding afterwards that Mr. Laurens had, on his return to America, received his full salary and emoluments from the Government, as Ambassador, Mr. Young, in the petition, prays that he may be paid the full amount of the salary he had, on the aforesaid considerations, relinquished. All the vouchers and documents relating to this subject were read: among others, an account settled between the United States and Mr. Young. The question, therefore, according to the opinion given by the gentlemen who supported the petition was, whether the present Government should avail itself of this settlement made under the circumstances already stated, and thereby preclude the petitioner from the full allowance to which he was, by a resolution of the former Congress entitled, especially as by the account settled it appears that Mr. Young made a reservation of a further claim. It was observed that the allegations in the petition were supported by the most explicit declarations on the part of Mr. Laurens; and that the petitioner was clearly and justly entitled to the sum he had relinquished on a contingency which had not taken place, but directly the reverse; it was said that it would be little short of taking a pettifogging advantage of the petitioner.

In opposition to the report in favor of the petitioner, it was said that the settlement made at the public office appears to have been done deliberately, and the allowance of the salary of £250 sterling, was made pursuant to certificates received from Mr. Laurens, as a full salary. It was urged, that if the Legislature should rip up transactions so long settled, and do away accounts finally closed with the proper officers, it would be a most dangerous precedent indeed. It was constantly echoed in the House, that these settlements were not to be disturbed; the consequence, it was easy to perceive, would be of the most perplexing nature; there would be no end to the applications which would take place; applications, accompanied with circumstances whose pretensions, it was said, were much more weighty and important than that now under consideration. It was further observed, that it does not appear that Mr. Laurens had deviated from his agreement with Mr. Young, in settling his account; for, though he had received his full salary as Ambassador, it plainly appears that he did not receive it merely as a compensation for his services as such, but in part as an indemnification for other services, and for losses he had sustained in consequence of being in public employment; and, therefore, Mr. Young's claim on account of a supposed violation of contract on the part of Mr. Laurens, is not well founded; and, besides, it was remarked, that Mr. Young, in the account he has settled, has no reference in his note of reservation, to any subsequent claim on account of any contract between him and Mr. Laurens. After a long debate, the question on agreeing to the report of the committee in favor of the petitioner, as above stated, was put and negatived, 27 to 25.

Mr. W. SMITH then moved that the petition of Moses Young, with the additional evidence and documents accompanying the same, be recommended to a select committee. This motion was lost.

THURSDAY, December 6.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services during the late war; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. KEY, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and report from the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States, pursuant to the order of the 26th ultimo; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. SEDGWICK reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from JOSHUA SENEY, one of the members for the State of Maryland, stating his acceptance of an appointment in the Judiciary Department of the said State, which disqualifies him from a seat in this House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received, with closed doors, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

UNITED STATES, December 6, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The several measures which have been pursued to induce the hostile Indian tribes, North of the Ohio, to enter into a conference or treaty with the United States, at which all causes of difference might be fully understood, and justly and amicably arranged, have already been submitted to both Houses of Congress. The papers, herewith sent, will inform you of the result.

The papers accompanying the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CASE OF WOODROP SIMS.

Mr. KEV, of the committee on the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims, brought in a report, which was, that the relief prayed for ought to be granted.

The reading of the petition was called for, the prayer of which is, that they may be released from the payment of duties on sundry goods lost on a voyage from New York to Philadelphia.

A motion was made to accept the report of the committee.

Mr. GOODHUE observed, that though he was disposed to grant relief in the case, yet he saw no principle on which it could be done; had the owners insured a sum sufficient to have covered the duties, they would have avoided the additional loss occasioned by having given bond for them. He thought that the House ought to proceed with great caution, as granting relief in the present case would be establishing a precedent which might be attended with great inconvenience and eventual loss of revenue.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that relief had been granted in a former case, which perhaps was similar; though he did not perfectly recollect the circumstances; and said he wished the law he alluded to might be read. He suggested the propriety of receiving the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, as it was of the greatest importance that a full investigation of the subject should take place previous to any decision.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, that this was an individual case; it stood on its own merits; every member of the House was fully competent to forming an opinion on it; and he hoped the House would determine respecting it for themselves.

Mr. FITZSIMONS then stated the particulars to show that this was a case of peculiar hardship and misfortune; and that the loss of the duties to which the petitioners were exposed, arose in part from an excess of official attention on the part of the Collector of New York. After some further remarks by different gentlemen, the petition and report were referred to a Committee of the Whole, for Monday next.

FRIDAY, December 7.

The Letter from Mr. SENEY, containing his resignation was again read, and a motion made to refer the same to a committee; some debate ensued on this motion, in which the question was started how far it was in the power of a member of the House to vacate his seat; the solution of this, it was said, would involve a lengthy discussion of some constitutional questions; if it was the opinion of the House that the present case naturally included this discussion, the reference ought to be to a Committee of the Whole. Some gentlemen thought that the most simple process was to accept the resignation, and make entry accordingly in the Journal; a notification to be sent to the Executive of the State of Maryland. The motion for commitment of the Letter was negatived; a motion was then made that the SPEAKER of the House notify the Executive of the State of Maryland of a representation of that State, by the resignation of Mr. SENEY. This motion was negatived and the Letter laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying certain statements, together with a Letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, relative to the disbursements made by the Department of War, in the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, pursuant to the order of the thirteenth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPENCER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to continue in force for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend in part the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The following Message was received, with closed doors, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

UNITED STATES, December 7, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you two Letters, with their enclosures, from the Governor of the Southwestern Territory, and an extract of a Letter to him from the Department of War.

These, and a Letter of the ninth of October last, which has been already communicated to you, from the same Department to the Governor, will show in what manner the first section of the act of the last session, which provides for calling out the Militia for the repelling of Indian invasions, has been executed. It remains to be considered by Congress whether, in the present situation of the United States, it be advisable or not to pursue any further or other measures than those which have already been adopted. The nature of the subject does, of itself, call for your immediate attention to it; and I must add, that, upon the result of your deliberations, the future conduct of the Executive will on this occasion materially depend.

G. WASHINGTON.

Ordered, That the said Message, together with the papers herein referred to, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

MONDAY, December 10.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts;" which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing the copy of a letter from the Governor of Georgia, together with certain communications relative to Indian affairs; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-day.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Message and papers under consideration, and made some progress therein.

TUESDAY, December 11.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of Abraham Scribner and Thomas Cable; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Message and papers under consideration, and made a further progress therein.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing a statement of certain materials whereon the estimate of contingencies of the War Department, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, are founded; also, an explanation of certain heads of articles in the general estimate, called "conjectural;" which were read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

A memorial of Moses Young was presented to the House and read, praying to be compensated for certain services as Secretary to Mr. LAURENS and to Doctor FRANKLIN, on their embassies to Holland and France, for which he has received no satisfaction.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial was presented of John Nicholson, Cornelius Barnes, John Mitchell, junior, and Norton Pryor, creditors of the United States, who loaned money between September, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, and March, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, praying that an appropriation may be made for the payment of the arrears of interest due, and the annual interest accruing on the amount of their respective claims.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That a loan to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States, be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and at the loan offices in the respective States, to commence within — months after the said balances shall be reported at the Treasury, and to continue open for the term of — months, from the time of its commencement.

"Resolved, That the sums to be subscribed to such loans be payable in the principal or interest of the certificates or notes issued by any such of the said States, as, upon the final settlement of accounts, shall have a balance due to them from the United States, and which shall have been liquidated to specie value prior to the — day of — last.

"Resolved, That every subscriber to the said loan shall be entitled to certificates according to the sum subscribed, of the like tenor and description, in the like proportions, and upon the like terms, as are specified and directed by the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," except that interest on such of the certificates subscribed to the said loan as bear interest, shall be computed to the last day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, inclusively, and that interest shall not begin to accrue upon any of the certificates which shall be issued in lieu thereof, till the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

"Resolved, That in all cases where the sum subscribed in the evidences of the debt of any State shall exceed the balance due to such State, the same shall be reduced (in equal proportions) to the sum actually due to such State.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on the first Monday of January next.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend in part the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THURSDAY, December 13.

ANDREW GREGG, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, and for the reimbursement of a certain loan made of the Bank of the United States, which lay on the table, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on this day fortnight.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported on Thursday last, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels, to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; and the said amendments being severally twice read were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a Return of all the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, belonging to the regular establishment of the United States, specifying the regiments or corps to which they belong, and the times of their entering the service.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. SENECA reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That, for defraying the expenditure of the Civil List of the United States for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices thereof, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:" [Here follow the several items.]

"Resolved, That, for making good deficiencies for the support of the Civil List Establishment, for aiding the fund appropriated for the payment of certain officers of the courts, jurors, and witnesses; for the support of light-houses, and for the establishment of ten cutters, and for other purposes, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:" [Here again follow the items.]

"Resolved, That, for defraying the expenses of the War Department for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, there be appropriated the following sums, to wit:" [The items follow.]

"Resolved, That, for making good the several and respective sums of money aforesaid, there be appropriated—

"1st. The sum of six hundred thousand dollars, reserved by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States.

"2d. The surplus which may remain unappropriated for the use of the War Department, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

"3d. So much of the existing revenues of the United States as are unappropriated."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, Mr. STEELE, and Mr. GILES do prepare and bring in the same.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt, on motion of Mr. SENECA, was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

A motion for its being made the order of the day, this day week, was opposed. Mr. MURRAY objected to so early a day. The subject, said he, is important; the State of Maryland has a right to six votes in this House; it so happens, that four seats of the representation from that State are vacant. He wished, therefore, that a more distant day may be appointed, as, in that case, it was highly probable that State would be more fully represented. Other reasons for a more distant day were urged by several gentlemen. This day fortnight was finally agreed to.

The House took into consideration the amendments by the Committee of the Whole to the coasting bill. They agreed to some of the amendments reported, with amendments; others were rejected. A clause was proposed to be added, requiring from the owners or masters of vessels a particular enumeration of all the goods, wares, and merchandise transported in the several coasting vessels from time to time. This occasioned some debate; it was objected to as involving a great and unnecessary expense, without affording a corresponding benefit; as tending to obstruct the coasting trade, so as almost to destroy the same. It was said it would be nugatory, being in many cases impracticable. The clause was supported, as conducive to information relative to the products and real consumptions of the several States—points on which very different opinions were entertained; that the expense would not probably be more than the addition of one clerk to the Treasury Department; that the duty would devolve on the collectors, and be a business, of course, &c. The motion was at length withdrawn. Some verbal corrections were made in several sections; and then, by general consent, the bill was laid on the table for further consideration.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the estimate of appropriations, Mr. SENECA in the Chair. The Chairman observed that the subject was before the Committee without any specific proposition.

Mr. KITCHELL moved that the Committee should rise, and report the resolutions submitted some time since.

It being remarked that these resolutions were yet to be determined on, having never been reported to the House, they were again read; and then a motion for the Committee to rise and report was made and agreed to. The Committee accordingly rose and reported the resolutions, which were taken into consideration by the House. The items of the estimate were again recited. The sum in the estimate for the support and expenses of the Loan Office occasioned considerable conversation. The accounts of the several Loan Offices were again called for; that from the officer at New York being read, it was remarked that the amount of this account exceeded that of Pennsylvania, and, indeed, of all the other accounts. This disparity, it was said, was very extraordinary, and did not appear to be accompanied with any sufficient reasons for so great a difference; and though the accounts had been settled by the proper officers of the Treasury, yet that they were liable to be revised by the House.

Some remarks in opposition were made. The question on agreeing to the sum reported in the estimate for the Loan Office, was carried in the affirmative.

The House having proceeded through the items included in the several resolutions, a motion was made and agreed to, that a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill in conformity thereto; and Messrs. LAURANCE, BALDWIN, SMITH, N. H., STEELE, and GILES, were appointed.

A motion that the estimate of contingencies received from the War Department, with the other papers relative to the estimate of appropriations, be referred to the select committee, was, after some debate, superseded by a motion to adjourn.

FRIDAY, December 14.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions of sundry persons, praying to be placed on the list of pensioners of the United States; also, a Letter from the Judges of the Circuit Court for the District of North Carolina, relative to the act passed the last session of Congress, regulating the claims to Invalid Pensions, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Monday, the 31st instant.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, accompanying lists of the names of persons returned to his office for pensions, by the Circuit Courts of the United States, together with the rates of the said pensions, and the causes assigned for disability, pursuant to the order of the 3d instant; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House last appointed.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of the inhabitants of St. Vincennes, on the Wabash; together with a Letter from the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio, accompanying the same, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels." Whereupon, Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendments to the fifth section.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the amendment to the seventeenth section of the said bill.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to, and alteration of the act, entitled 'An act for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read the first time.

REGISTERING VESSELS.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the registering and recording of ships or vessels were taken into consideration. The first, second, and third amendments were agreed to. The fourth amendment was to strike out the 17th section of the bill, which was designed to guard effectually against collusion in regard to American vessels—it having been ascertained that impositions in this respect had been practised with success. The amendment of the Senate was objected to; it was said it left the door still open to the owners of foreign vessels to evade payment of foreign tonnage. Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. SENECA, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. MADISON, opposed the amendment.

Mr. FITZSIMONS appeared to be partially in favor of the amendment; he observed that there was no clause in the British navigation law, equally rigid with that proposed in the bill, and which the Senate have objected to. He observed that the policy of such restrictions as went to discourage the building of vessels in the United States may well be doubted; but though he was not perfectly satisfied with the clause in the bill, yet he should not vote to concur with the Senate.

Mr. W. SMITH said he agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his remarks, but should draw a very different conclusion, and should therefore be in favor of concurring with the Senate; but if the House should not be disposed to concur, he inquired whether the proposal to strike out the clause could not be adopted without agreeing to the substitute?

Mr. BARNWELL was in favor of concurring with the Senate.

Mr. PARKER opposed the amendment. He said the operation of the proposed clause from the Senate might tend to increase the building of American vessels, but would most certainly tend to the injury of the mercantile interest in general. The collusions alluded to by several gentlemen, he observed, had undoubtedly taken place; and, if there is not some effectual provision, like that in the bill, adopted, the commerce of the United States in a few years would be transferred to foreigners altogether.

Mr. MANSON was opposed to the amendment. He added a few remarks, corroborative of the sentiments delivered by Mr. PARKER; and then the question being put, the amendment of the Senate was disagreed to.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Message and papers under consideration, and made a farther progress therein.

MONDAY, December 17.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to, and alteration of the act, entitled 'An act for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the second Monday of January next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the Executors of Edward Carnes, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. SEDGWICK reported that the Committee had had the said Report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally read twice, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That all persons having claims upon the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, whether founded upon certificates, or other written documents from public officers or otherwise, (except Loan Office certificates, and certificates of final settlement, Register's certificates, and certificates issued pursuant to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States,) shall exhibit the same at the Treasury of the United States within ——— months, or be forever barred from payment or settlement.

Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to settle and adjust, after the expiration of the term aforesaid, all such of those claims as shall appear to them proper to be admitted, and to report to Congress upon all such as they may not think proper to admit.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. Good-

HUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. NILES, do prepare and bring in the same. A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate recede from their amendment disagreed to by this House, to the seventeenth section of the bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels."

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Message and papers under consideration, and come to no resolution thereupon.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that the said Message and papers do lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 18.

A memorial of the officers, now residing in the State of New York, of the late American Army, in behalf of themselves and their brethren the soldiers of the said Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them in reward for their military services during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit. Also, a memorial of the Pennsylvania line of the late Army, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said memorials do lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House, on the 6th instant, to the bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be recommitted to Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. PARKER.

The House proceeded to consider the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians, which lay on the table. Whereupon, A motion being made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ such part of the military force and of the Militia of the United States, as he may judge necessary, for the effectual protection of the frontiers; and (if he shall judge it expedient) to carry on offensive operations against the Indians of the five lower Cherokee towns, called Chickamugas, and such other of the Indian tribes as may hereafter commit acts of depredation against the lives and property of the citizens of the United States."

A division of the said motion was called for. Whereupon,

The question being put, that the House do agree to the first part of the said motion, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ such part of the military force and of the Militia of the United States, as he may judge necessary for the effectual protection of the frontiers; and (if he shall judge it expedient) to carry on offensive operations against the Indians of the five lower Cherokee towns, called Chickamugas."

It passed in the negative—yeas 21, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS.—Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Abraham Clark, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, William B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Huger, Richard Bland Lee, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, John Page, Josiah Parker, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Laurance, Anasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Hugh Williamson.

And so the said motion was lost.

WEDNESDAY, December 19.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing an extract of a letter from Brigadier General Wilkinson; also, a copy of a letter from James Seagrove, relative to Indian Affairs; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is referred so much of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury made on the 3d instant, as relates to a plan for the reimbursement of a certain loan made of the Bank of the United States, be discharged from the consideration of the same; and that a committee be appointed to report a bill authorizing a loan equal to the sum borrowed of the said Bank, to be applied to the said reimbursement, and providing that so much of the dividend in the stock of Government in the said Bank, as may be necessary, be appropriated for paying the interest of the sum to be borrowed.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. MURRAY, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

THURSDAY, December 20.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of Ludwig Kuhn; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of the officers, now residing in the State of Maryland, of the late American Army, in behalf of themselves and their brethren the soldiers of the said Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them in reward for their military services during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. STEELE laid a resolution on the table, to the following purport, viz:

"That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States to ——— regiments or corps, consisting each of ——— non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, with such proportion of commissioned officers as the President may think proper to continue in service; and to repeal so much of an act passed the 6th of March, 1792, entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States,' as may contravene this intention."

This motion, Mr. STEELE said, he was influenced to bring forward, from two motives: the first was, to afford more effectual protection to the frontiers; the other was, that, by this reduction, a sum of money might be drawn from the War Department, to be applied to the reduction of the Public Debt, so that a necessity for new taxes, to effect that object, may be superceded.

COASTING BILL.

The select committee to whom the coasting bill had been recommitted reported sundry amendments; which were taken into consideration by the House, and all of them agreed to.

Mr. CLARK objected to a clause in the 12th section, which enjoins that every change of the master of every packet or ferry-boat shall be reported at the custom-house the first opportunity.

Mr. DAYTON stated the inconveniences to which the masters and owners of the small coasting craft and packet boats belonging to the State of New Jersey would be particularly exposed by this injunction, where the masters are very frequently changed.

To remove this objection, Mr. GOODHUE proposed to insert the words "ferry-boats excepted."

This motion was adopted. It was then ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading.

INDIAN TRADE.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes were taken into consideration.

Objections were made to the 5th section, which contemplates legislating and punishing crimes committed within the boundaries of the Indian countries. It was contended that the cases mentioned were fully provided for by treaties, or by the laws of the respective States; the whole ground, it was said, is covered by these provisions; and therefore there appears an impropriety, if not an absurdity, in enacting, in a subsequent law, that certain punishments shall be inflicted for certain crimes, which are sufficiently recognised by the several treaties already formed; that the attempt would operate unjustly; the provisions may reach our own citizens, but cannot affect so fully as they ought the savages. It was moved that the whole section should be stricken out.

In opposition to this motion, it was said that the power of the General Government to legislate in all the territory belonging to the Union, not within the limits of any particular State, cannot be doubted; if the Government cannot make laws to restrain persons from going out of the limits of any of the States, and commit murders and depredations, it would be in vain to expect any peace with the Indian tribes. The power of Congress to legislate, independent of treaties, it was also said, must be admitted; for it is impossible that every case should be provided for by those treaties.

The question being called for, Mr. CLARK rose and observed, that he conceived it was of importance that the House should vote with their eyes open; and, to enable them to do this, he said he should read the ordinance of the late Congress, passed in 1787, respecting the settlement of the Western country. He observed that he believed very few of the members had turned their attention to it. He accordingly read such parts of the ordinance as he thought essential to the point, which was to show that the clause of the bill now under consideration would in its operation violate the solemn stipulations with the settlers contained in the ordinance, as full provision is contained in the ordinance to institute all civil and criminal processes. The motion for striking out the section was negatived. The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were agreed to, with some amendments. Various subsequent amendments were moved, with various success, some being agreed to and others rejected. Without finishing the discussion of the bill, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 21.

Mr. SENEWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

A petition of Robert Ralston, Assignee of the estate of Thomas Barclay, was presented to the House and read, praying that payment may be made to him as legal representative of the said Thomas Barclay, for the amount of certain claims for services rendered by him to the United States previous to the 16th day of May, 1791.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings, in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service," and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. STEELE proposed that the bill should be postponed to the first Monday in January. He observed that he had laid a motion on the table for a committee to report a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States. This appropriation bill makes provision for the present establishment; and if it is acted upon and passed immediately it will preclude an opportunity for discussing the merits of the proposition contained in the motion which he had made.

The motion for the first Monday in January was negatived.

Mr. STEELE then moved the last Monday in December; which being put, was carried.

INDIAN TRADE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. A motion to amend the fifth section by altering the clause which makes it felony for any citizen or citizens of the United States unlawfully to invade any Indian settlement, to fine and imprisonment for that crime, occasioned considerable debate. This motion was finally supported by one to recommit the bill; which being carried, it was reported to the select committee which reported it. On motion, Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. MURRAY were added to the committee.

MONDAY, December 24.

An engrossed bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, was read the third time and passed.

A memorial of the merchants and traders of the borough of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as do not allow a drawback upon goods, wares, and merchandise, unless they are exported from the district or port into which they were originally imported, may be revised and amended.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the copy of a Letter from the Governor of Georgia, together with an enclosure, relative to Indian affairs in the Southern department; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of the application of the moneys borrowed in Antwerp and Amsterdam, for the United States, within the present year.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOAN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for a reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States—Mr. WHITE in the Chair.

The bill was read by the Chairman, and then considered in paragraphs.

The first section being read—Mr. GILES said he was rather in favor of postponing the subject; but if it is peculiarly advantageous to the interest of the United States to make provision for this object immediately, he suggested whether it would not be better, if possible, to provide for it without having recourse to the expending of a new loan. He was averse to increasing the Debt of the United States by additional loans. He was rather in favor of applying the property belonging to the United States in the Bank of the United States for the purpose. He therefore moved that the section should be stricken out which provides for a loan, in order to substitute a clause providing for the sale of the shares in the Bank, owned by the United States, that the proceeds may be applied to the reimbursement of the Loan.

Mr. SENEWICK doubted whether the motion was in order, as it went to a totally different object from any specified in the bill.

The Chairman remarked that a motion to strike out the section was in order.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed that, if the idea of the gentleman was adopted, he was clearly of opinion that the sale of the shares would not produce a sum adequate to the object, as bringing such a number of shares to market would undoubtedly reduce the price greatly below the present market price.

Mr. GILES said he was rather desirous of a postponement of the subject; he was not prepared to decide upon it; he suspected many gentlemen in the Committee were in the same predicament; he would therefore withdraw his motion for striking out, under a persuasion that no sudden decision would take place.

Mr. FITZSIMONS stated several reasons why the Committee should proceed in the business; particularly as it involves an economical disposal of property now lying useless, and a provision for the support of the public credit; no increase of the public debt is contemplated, said he, but directly the reverse.

Mr. CLARK said he never, while he had a seat in the House, would consent to a foreign loan, unless the exigencies of the country were much greater than at present. He had rather pay seven and a half per cent. to our own citizens than five per cent. to foreigners. He objected to the indefiniteness of the section, and moved to amend it by adding a clause which should confine the Loan within the United States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS suggested to Mr. CLARK a proviso, agreeable to his own idea, that the interest be at six or eight per cent.

Mr. CLARK replied that he had no doubt it might be had at six per cent., or less.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said he wished the gentleman would point out how he would contrive to prevent foreigners from being our creditors, even by confining the Loan to the United States. At an interest of six per cent. you will in fact give a premium of above two hundred thousand dollars per annum, which might be saved by opening a Loan at five per cent. in Europe. Devise what contrivance you please, (said Mr. W.) it must be a foreign Loan.

Mr. BOURNOR observed that the motion of his colleague amounted to the same thing in the result as the motion for striking out the section. The Loan is now at six per cent.; to say that a new Loan shall be made at six per cent. to pay it off, is losing all the advantages proposed by the bill. He was therefore against the motion.

Mr. GILES moved that the Committee should rise and report progress. He observed that very material information was wanted, in his opinion, to enable the Committee to proceed understandingly in the matter.

The motion for the Committee's rising was put and negatived.

Mr. CLARK's motion to amend the section, by adding the word "within" before "United States," was also negatived.

The Committee proceeded through the discussion of the remaining sections.

Mr. MADISON offered several observations to show the propriety of postponing the bill for a few days, in order to the members having time to revolve in their minds several propositions which have been suggested in relation to this subject—whether by an appropriation of the sum, which it is said now lies dormant in the Treasury, whether by a sale of the shares in the Bank, or by a Loan, to provide for the object.

Mr. FITZSIMONS stated some objections to what fell from the gentleman last speaking. The gentleman's idea goes to an immediate interference with an appropriation already made, and leaves to a contingency a provision to supply its place.

Mr. MADISON replied to Mr. FITZSIMONS. He thought the gentleman offered as good a reason as he could have suggested in favor of applying the money in the Treasury to the object now in question.

Mr. GILES urged postponement. He remarked that the zeal shown by some gentlemen to precipitate the matter to a decision, amounted to an exercise of deliberation on the subject.

Mr. SENEWICK stated several reasons which rendered it absolutely necessary that no delay should take place.

A motion being made that the Committee should rise and report the bill, the same being put, was agreed to.

The Committee rose accordingly, and reported the bill, with one amendment; which was, to strike out the word "fifteen," in the first section, referring to the time for which the Loan should be made. This amendment was agreed to by the House, and the bill laid on the table by general consent.

WEDNESDAY, December 26.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named; which was read the first time.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOAN.

The House proceeded to consider the bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, which lay on the table. Whereupon,

A motion was made and seconded to amend the said bill by striking out the first section, in the words following, to wit:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per centum per annum, to be applied to the reimbursement of a loan made of the Bank of the United States, in pursuance of the eleventh section of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States:' Provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed within — years after the same shall be lent or advanced."

Mr. STEELE declared himself in favor of the intention of the bill. He wished the honor of the country to be preserved, and its debts duly discharged, as much as any man; but he could not approve of the repeated practice of making new loans. The facility of borrowing money is mostly attended with dangerous consequences, both to individuals and to States. For his part, notwithstanding the unpopular appearance of direct taxation, he would prefer it to the system of loans. He was anxious to hear the opinions of other gentlemen, and wished the subject might be fairly discussed, in order to afford an opportunity for which, he had moved that the first section of the bill be struck out, so that, if this motion should prevail, some other plan than borrowing might be substituted.

Mr. GILES seconded the motion. Mr. MADISON was desirous to hear the reasons that could be given by the friends of the bill for requiring so much greater a loan than the sum demandable by the Bank. He observed, that there was a large balance of money lying in the Treasury unappropriated, at least, to his knowledge. If, however, this balance was appropriated by the Executive, he wished to know it. He did not suppose but that if it was, it must have been done with propriety; and he would be one of the last men in the House to injure any existing appropriation.

Mr. SEDGWICK, who was of the committee that reported the bill, rose to reply to Mr. MADISON. He said, that the subject involved a degree of delicacy at present which perhaps it would be better not to express. It is known that money has been borrowed for certain purposes which has not yet been applied; but this money, he thought, ought not to be diverted to other purposes, without providing a substitute to replace the sum which might be diverted, and such provision ought to be made before the time when it would be wanted to answer the original appropriation. In reply to Mr. STEELE, he said, this new loan was not intended to increase the debt of the United States, but to decrease it by paying a debt bearing an interest of six per cent. with a loan at five.

Mr. MADISON said, that either the public money lying dormant in the Treasury is or is not appropriated. If it is appropriated for carrying on the Indian war, he was of opinion it could not be touched by a diversion in favor of the Bank, upon the uncertainty of having it replaced by a fresh loan to answer the original specific appropriation. Perhaps (said Mr. M.) I am ignorant of my situation; if so, I hope gentlemen will relieve me by explaining candidly the real state of the matter.

Mr. BALDWIN had recourse to the two acts for empowering the President to borrow twelve millions of dollars, and afterwards two millions. The former was to answer an existing demand against the United States; the latter was made at the Bank for another purpose, and all that is demandable is the first instalment and interest, which he was willing to have discharged, but he was opposed to replacing it by a new foreign loan. He remarked, that the United States had been regulated in paying off their interest and instalments—and of the foreign debt there is only a part demandable—but the disposition of the whole is disliked; and it is in the power of the United States to alter it, by making provision for the whole amount, if they please to do so. The President is authorized to do this, provided he can do it on advantageous terms. The creditors were not contented when this law was made, and the United States will be guilty of no breach of faith provided they pay their interest and instalments as they fall due.

Mr. GERRY went over the laws respecting the former loans, and the law for redeeming the public debt, also the act for making the loan at the Bank. From all which, he argued that the question was simply reduced to this: Whether the President shall be empowered to take up a loan at five to pay a sum borrowed at six per cent. interest, and provisionally to make use of the money obtained by loan which is at present lying inactive? And if this be not agreed to, the United States must go on paying to the Bank annually, for ten years, two hundred thousand dollars; and, at the end of that time, fifty-five thousand dollars more will have been paid there, if the President was now authorized to borrow at five per cent. The question, therefore, was, is this sum worth saving? For his part, he was against paying a higher interest any where than five per cent.; and, with regard to foreigners, if it was alleged that our stocks would be kept from getting out of the hands of our own citizens as much as possible, he thought this a vain expectation, for it is impossible to prevent it, so long as foreigners find it their interest to purchase.

An idea had been started of selling out part of the stock owned by the United States, as this would lower the price by throwing too great a quantity into market. He should prefer keeping it until the present disorders in Europe subsided.

Mr. WILLIAMSON did not approve of the motion, because he was opposed to the idea of selling the Bank stock belonging to the United States. He rather wished that they held twice as much property in that institution. But, if the stock was sold, it would pass into foreign hands, and the country would be drained of the specie. It would, therefore, be better to keep it in circulation in the country. It is the only thing that can be called secure. Indeed, he doubted whether that property could be honestly parted with, considering that the law incorporating the Bank specifically provides for the retaining two millions of dollars stock. The other eight millions has been subscribed for, perhaps the greatest part of it by foreigners or other agents, and now, if the motion under consideration prevails, we shall throw away out of our hands the remaining two millions. It certainly gave a security and solidity to the institution, and was an encouragement to many subscribers, the idea that the United States held a considerable share of the stock; but now, to dispose of that stock would be putting them in a worse situation than they originally were. It would have an effect something like an ex post facto law.

Mr. MADISON expressed some surprise at the arguments of the gentleman last up, because they were absolutely in direct contradiction to the gentleman's opinion, and the opinion of the Legislature, and the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury on all former occasions; for it has hitherto been held up as a valuable and secure resource in case of emergency to have that stock to dispose of, and why shall it not be of the same quality with the stock of any other subscriber—transferable? It is the first time (said Mr. M.) I ever heard the thing denied, that the United States should dispose of their stock whenever it became the interest of the country to do it, with equal facility as other stockholders do. I believe, however, the gentleman (Mr. WILLIAMSON) may have been right in his intentions, but he is certainly wrong in the application of his arguments. Mr. M. again expressed a desire that some candid explanation might be given respecting the appropriation of the money lying dormant in the Treasury, whether it was demanded abroad by the country to which it was due, and for which it had been borrowed. There was not any necessity for hurrying a decision on one part of the question—respecting the propriety of borrowing at five per cent. to pay off a debt at six, that could be deliberated upon without precipitation. The other part of the question involved a very different subject, that of diverting a sum already appropriated for a particular purpose, and applying it to another purpose, they paying the Bank instalment, &c., and this on no better foundation than the uncertainty of a new loan to replace the original appropriation. He declared, that he could not see how gentlemen would be able to answer to their constituents for such conduct, especially if it was originally intended to satisfy the debt or instalments due to France—a debt of justice and of gratitude. If it was intended to pay a debt to support a glorious cause, the cause of liberty, he wished it could be sent there, if possible, on the wings of the wind! It may be argued that the whole of this debt is not yet demandable; yet, as an appropriation has been made to pay it, it is presumable that it would be particularly acceptable, from the situation of France at this time. He concluded by declaring his dissent from any diversion of the appropriation, unless further light could be thrown on the subject than had yet appeared.

Mr. WILLIAMSON rose to explain. In regard to the notice which Mr. MADISON had taken of his arguments, he proved that the last-named gentleman had misunderstood him, and that he was equally anxious with him, both as to the honor of the country and the propriety of its measures.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was against the motion, and in favor of making the new loan. He said nothing as to the diversion of the money appropriated to pay a part of our engagements to France, only that it was his opinion there had been no demand made on the part of that country.

Mr. MURRAY expressed opinions very nearly similar to those of Mr. BALDWIN. He particularly noticed that the President was allowed a discretionary power to extend the loans, or not, as he should judge the interests of the country concerned. He took a general view of the arguments advanced by Mr. MADISON and Mr. WILLIAMSON, and noticed the honorable course of France.

Mr. MADISON rose again to explain in regard to the misconception of his arguments by Mr. WILLIAMSON. He was willing to admit of any reason for a diversion of the appropriation of the former loan intended to pay part of our debt to France, except one. He would admit of any reason from the Executive but one, and that was, what he had heard alleged, not in but out of Congress: "That there would ever exist a possibility of paying the debt over again." This reason he could never admit; because, although it might be vainly presumed that the present Government of France had not yet arrived at a proper stage of maturity, yet it must be evident to all the rational part of mankind that it was sufficiently established to insure it against all possibility of a retrograde motion.

Mr. GILES had seconded the motion of Mr. STEELE on this ground, that, although a sum of two hundred thousand dollars was wanted on the first of January, to pay to the Bank of the United States, yet, it did not follow from thence that two millions must be borrowed. He remarked, that no member had yet offered any explanation, on behalf of the Executive, how the money lying dormant was disposed of, or intended to be. He could not see any great advantage in borrowing a new loan, although at five per cent., when it must be considered that an agency or douceur has always been paid of from four to five per cent. over and above the interest. This premium entirely destroys the arguments of gain to the United States; for we shall lose sixty thousand dollars by it, and, until the term of fifteen years shall have arrived, we will not make a beginning of savings, according to the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on this very subject. After some further remarks, Mr. GILES moved that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement of the loans and the applications thereof.

Mr. FINDLEY expressed himself in favor of the motion. Mr. STEELE particularly observed, that, in the course of the debate, a glimmering of light had been opened on the subject of loans, which he hoped might lead to a complete investigation. Loans had originated in an intention of saving money to the public; but it was now become the duty of Congress to see how much new debt had been created, and what proportion it bore to the amount extinguished. For his part, he would rather a paltry sum of sixteen thousand dollars were lost to the United States than that the House should go on voting in the dark.

Mr. VENABLE said, that, considering the douceurs and premiums which had been paid for foreign loans at a low interest, we were now in a worse situation than before those loans had been contracted for, because they had increased the capital of our public debt eighty thousand dollars, and it will require a term of four years to bring about an equality in the interest, and to reduce it to an average of five per cent.

In reply to this, Mr. FITZSIMONS took occasion to correct a mistake which the last mentioned member had committed. The premiums and douceurs paid on different loans, he said, had not averaged more than from four to four and a half and five per cent. on the whole capital; and he called upon the House to witness whether there was not a very material difference between the capital at five per cent. and one at six per cent. It must be evident there is so great a difference in the capital that the five per cent. reduces every £100 at six per cent. to £83 6s 8d., besides the continual and multiplied decrease produced on the reduced interest itself.

Mr. VENABLE said, the gentleman's arguments would only hold good upon a supposition that the capital was never to be paid; but it must be granted that the United States have retained the power of paying it off at any time, and in this case the arguments in favor of new loans accompanied with premium falls to the ground.

Mr. GERRY and Mr. BOUNDNOT insisted that the loan contemplated would produce the great saving to the United States of $160,000 in fifteen years. Mr. TUCKER was against striking out the whole of the first section, unless a substitute was adopted to pay off the instalment to the Bank of $200,000, but he observed, that, as there was a dividend due from the Bank upon the stock owned by the United States of $60,000, it would therefore be necessary to provide for no more than the sum of $140,000.

The question being called for, was put, upon striking out the whole of the first section, and passed in the negative—yeas 18, nays 35, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittera, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, John Milledge, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Another motion was then made, and the question put, to amend the said bill by striking out, in the said first section, the words "two millions of dollars," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "two hundred thousand dollars."

The yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, there appeared—yeas 27, nays 26.

Whereupon, the SPEAKER declared himself with the nays.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, Richard Bland Lee, James Madison, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Israel Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Those who voted in the negative are—Jonathan Trumbull, Speaker, Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, John Wilkes Kittera, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, William Vans Murray, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, William Smith, George Thatcher, and Jeremiah Wadsworth.

And so the said question was lost. Another motion was then made and seconded, to amend the said bill by striking out, in the said first section, the words "not exceeding," and inserting, in lieu thereof the words "which, including the expense, shall not exceed," and the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 27.

A bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1783, as an indemnity to the persons therein named, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause this House to be furnished with a particular account of the several sums borrowed under his authority by the United States; the terms on which each loan has been obtained; the applications to which any of the moneys have been made, agreeably to appropriations; and the balances, if any, which remain unapplied. In this statement it is requested that it may be specified at what times interest commenced on the several sums obtained, and at what times it was stopped by the several payments made.

Ordered, That the said resolution be transmitted to the President of the UNITED STATES by the SPEAKER.

A petition of William Ellery, Collector of the District of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, was presented to the House and read, praying that the compensation allowed him by law may be increased, and rendered more adequate to his services.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do now proceed to the further consideration of the bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, it passed in the negative.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and partly considered.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said amendments be put off until to-morrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the present organization of the troops; also, Returns of the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, in the service of the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, December 28.

A memorial of the officers and soldiers of the late New Hampshire line of the Continental Army was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them in reward for their military services during the late war may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit; which was laid on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and the said amendments being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House. And then, the said bill, being further amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. STEELE called up his resolution laid on the table some days ago, as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States to ——— regiments or corps, consisting each of ——— non-commissioned officers, privates and musicians, with such proportion of commissioned officers as the PRESIDENT may think proper to continue in service; and to repeal so much of an act, passed the fifth of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, entitled 'An act for making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States,' as may contravene this intention."

Mr. STEELE, in proposing the above resolution, said, the situation of the frontiers, and the inefficiency of the measures adopted, through the medium of the War Department, to relieve them; the extreme burdens which those measures were heaping on the people, and the probability of their continuance, afforded ample scope for inquiry, and to sit silent on such an occasion, he thought, would be to partake of and support the errors from which those misfortunes may have arisen. The citizens of the United States, he said, were of a peaceable and patient disposition, and they have with cheerfulness acquiesced in the measures of the National Legislature; but they were not become so tame as to submit to immense and fruitless expenses, and the disgrace of their military character to answer any vain projects of folly and ambition, without a prospect of guaranteeing a peace. Is it not evident, said he, that plans have been persevered in without regard to common sense, by an unnecessary increase of our Army, until the indignation of the whole Continent has been roused up against it?

To elucidate this position, Mr. S. recited the expenses, charges, and increase of the War Department from its first establishment under the present Government, to its present enormous demands, which, for the year 1793, are no less, agreeably to the estimate furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, than $1,171,719. More than double the sum necessary for the support of all the other branches of the National Government. The better to illustrate this subject of the Indian War, he entered into comparative statements of the years 1790, '91, '92, and '93. And, animadverting on the different items of calculation, he asserted, in strong terms, that they exceeded every thing that the history of the Indian wars afforded for twenty years back; he wished any gentleman to enter into an investigation and comparison of the alarming increase of the expenses of the Department, and to take a retrospect of the subject for twenty years back; and he was certain neither the Secretary of War nor any other person could account rationally for the occasion of such an establishment. There was no precedent to be found in any of the States, not one of them have a War Department; neither was it contemplated in the Constitution of the United States. Yet it has, in the short space of three or four years, been imposed on the country burdens which the people have at length expressed their abhorrence of; it has been increased $137,000 in 1789, to the extravagant demand now required, of $1,171,719. This is so alarming an increase that it calls loudly for reformation, and the entire abolition of the Department, and that another system shall be adopted for the protection of the frontiers. Armies of regulars will never afford protection; they have never answered any good purpose against the Indians from the time of Braddock's defeat down to that of Major General St. Clair, although this last mentioned unfortunate expedition cost the United States an immense sum of money, and the lives of a great number of valuable officers and citizens. History and the experience of ages have proved this fact, that unwieldy armies will never be able to fight the savages in the wilderness; indeed, the Secretary of War confesses the fact in one of his reports, which Mr. S. read, wherein the Secretary accounts for the ill success of the plans, by observing, "that it was owing to the extreme activity of the enemy and our ignorance of the wilderness through which our troops had to march." But the Secretary might have also added, our entire ignorance of the mode of carrying on the war.

Here Mr. S. took occasion to observe, that this alarmingly expensive and useless Department had crept upon the country entirely from our fondness for taking up money on loans; for had it not been that the money was thus obtained with a sort of facility that was not directly felt by the people, they never would have consented to be directly taxed to support the parade of so unnecessary an establishment. This is my reason for being an enemy to loans; they deceive the citizens, and lull them for a time, in order to levy double contributions afterwards.

But it may be demanded, how are the frontiers to be protected, if the Army was disbanded? In reply to this, Mr. S. said he wished that the former two regiments might be retained to garrison the forts, and that a militia near the scene of action should be raised, who would be able to make five expeditions against the savages in a year, if necessary, instead of one solitary fruitless attempt, which, upon an average, is as much as a regular army can do; and sometimes not so much, for it does not appear that any expedition took place during the last twelve months: moreover, it is not so easy for the Indians to discover the plans and approaches of militia, as they do the slow motions of an unwieldy army, dragging their heavy artillery through the woods. The fact is, that the Indians have the best intelligence, and know every motion of the Army, and they can even calculate the time and place to meet them, and the numbers of their tribes that will be necessary to receive such a force; they will always be prepared when a regular army are to march against them. But if the business be left to a militia of the frontier inhabitants, who know the country, and have their property at stake, it would not cost the Government one-fourth part of the expense to give a complete protection, and to repel all the depredations of the savages, if that be our intention. If it be the protection and happiness of our brethren on the frontiers—if we are serious to check the progress of expense, the motion which I have brought forward will be the most effectual means, and to establish a proper Militia System. On this motion, therefore, will depend the question, whether we are to continue a fruitless warfare in the present mode for seven or ten years, or shall we adopt a better system, which will not cost one-fourth of the expense, and which would completely check the Indians; nay, it would entirely exterminate them, if that was thought to be necessary.

In order to bring the matter to a point, Mr. S. suggested, that it would be proper to disband all the troops except the two former regiments of two thousand and one hundred and twenty-eight men, which would be more than sufficient to garrison all the fourteen posts on the frontier. These, with a militia, under proper regulations, and the officers appointed by the President, would be found a more certain protection. The garrisons are at Fayette, Hamilton, Steuben, Knox, Tammany, Telfair, Har-mar, Franklin, Jefferson, St. Clair, Marietta, Massachusetts, Matthews, and Knoxville. Most of these are commanded by Captains, except two that are commanded by Majors; now, reducing the establishment to two thousand one hundred and eighteen non-commissioned and privates, and average them amongst the garrisons, it will give one hundred and fifty-two men for each; the sum saved by this reduction would be six hundred and twenty-four thousand six hundred and seven dollars—the difference between the appropriations for 1792 and those required for 1793.

With regard to the expense that would be incurred from militia expeditions, none of them would cost above thirty thousand dollars; and four or five of those, if made in a year, would have ten times the success and effect that could be expected from the present system. Had the Militia plan been adopted, we should not at this day hear such murmurs from our constituents, nor would the people be saddled with heavy taxes and imposts; but, on the contrary, the money that has been actually wasted would have sunk a considerable part of our National Debt. But by the system of warfare lately adopted of dragging heavy cannon and camps into a wilderness, of which we have confessed our ignorance, if it be allowed any longer, our Treasury will be exhausted, and the public revenues which the Secretary of the Treasury reported as affording a prospect of income beyond the permanent wants of Government, will not all together be sufficient for our War Establishment; we must fly to loans, and pursue a system of ruin and distress to the country. Under these impressions, said Mr. S., I have introduced the proposition now before the House; and I entreat gentlemen to think seriously of it, for thereon, in a high degree, will depend the real protection of our frontier, the safety of our garrisons, and the ultimate ease, happiness, and tranquility of the Continent.

Mr. HARTLEY, although he did not wish to advocate the continuance of a Standing Army, yet he was averse to disbanding the troops at present, while it is known that a negotiation for a peace is going forward, and may not perhaps be brought to a decision before the Spring. It is a well known maxim in politics, that a peace can always be easiest obtained by a nation which is prepared for war. He noticed the great prudence and economy of the President in forming the Army into a legion; and he differed in opinion with Mr. STEELE respecting the insufficiency of regular troops. No instance could be quoted where regulars had engaged the Indians without beating them.

Mr. PARKER said he had always abhorred the idea of keeping up Standing Armies in this country; and he believed he could, from experience, demonstrate that it was an unwise measure at the commencement of the present Government; for it answered no better purpose than throwing out a hint to the British and Spanish Governments, on our Northern and Southern frontiers, to increase their forces, and even to administer countenance and support to the Indians, which they never would have thought of doing, but for our vain attempt at military parade. He mentioned a letter which had been written by Lord Dorechester to the Indians, informing them "that Prince Edward had arrived with a number of chosen warriors to protect them," meaning against the United States.

Thus, said Mr. P., we have been warring with our finances for the last three years, by keeping up an Army in imitation of European plans, which are formed in countries altogether unanalogous to America in every possible view. The consequences have been unsuccessful, and produced military disgraces, by sending into the field a collection of beings, collected from stews and brothels and from the most unprincipled of their species, to fight against Indians well supported on both sides, and fighting, as they do, for their property, their hunting ground, their wives, and children, instead of calling forth the militia, the natural strength of the country. But the present plan has involved us in such difficulties that we are not now able to provide for the payment of our debts, without the medium of loans; nay, we are now called on for a small sum of two hundred thousand dollars at the Bank, which would have been easily paid out of the surplus in the Treasury, were it not that our finances have been exhausted by those ill-judged expeditions under General Harmer and General St. Clair. He mentioned the naked, starved appearance of the men who were sent out—with shoes that would not last three days, clothes that did not half cover their miserable bodies from the inclemency of the weather, and food sometimes not fit for dogs. He could mention the particulars, if required, of some other very abominable abuses, but refrained from it at present. He concluded by expressing the same opinion of militia that Mr. S. had done; and, with regard to the starved soldiery who had appeared in the woods, they were despised so much by the Indians, that they called them Cost-men, and shot them down like wild turkeys.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was apprehensive that it would be a dangerous experiment, so suddenly to alter the system of defence already adopted. He remarked, that when Mr. STEELE had stated the War Department to have cost the United States three millions five hundred and forty thousand dollars, he had committed a great mistake, for there was one million one hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars of that sum not yet granted. [Mr. STEELE explained, that he had gone by the estimates for the appropriations proposed, &c.] Mr. FITZSIMONS did not wish to advocate a Standing Army; and if any better mode of defence for the frontiers could be digested, he would be amongst the foremost who would agree to it.

Mr. WHITE could not entirely approve of the motion for striking out, unless a proper substitute for defence was fairly brought forward.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said, it was not disbanding an army of men, but the disbanding an army of paper, that he conceived to be the object of the motion, and it should have his support. He mentioned an affair between ninety militia and two hundred and forty Indians, wherein the militia received them much better than any of the regulars could boast of having done!

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, reverted to a clause in the law which empowers the President either to raise those three additional regiments, or to forbear to raise them, or discharge them, &c., provided he thought it consistent with the safety of the country. From this, Mr. S. said it was evident there was a sort of indecision in the motion, as it implies a doubt that the President might fail in this instance, or vary from his usual line of prudence.

Mr. DAYTON said, he would vote for referring the motion to a Committee of the Whole, although he disapproved of it. He should not have risen, had he not heard from the two North Carolina members the strangest perversion of argument and the most extraordinary reasoning. The gentleman who has brought forward the motion, said Mr. D., has decried every idea of energy and efficiency in regular, disciplined troops, considering them not only inefficient, but contemptible, when employed against Indians; and, to confirm this assertion, he has instanced the expedition under General St. Clair, when it is well known that there were not, in fact, two companies of regular disciplined infantry among them. The other gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMSON] has extravagantly commended the back-country militia, and extolled them for their efficiency and success in Indian warfare; and instances the affair of a rencontre between Major Adair, with ninety militia, against two hundred and forty Indians. In reply to this, Mr. D. felt himself compelled to remark, that that affair did not appear so successful in his mind; for those very militia were unquestionably surprised and beaten, inasmuch as they were driven into a corner, until the Indians captured all their horses and other property in their camp; and what is still more disgraceful, one half of the Major's party deserted him at the commencement of the action, and secured themselves within their garrison.

Whilst he was up, Mr. D. would further observe on the extraordinary speech of the mover of the question, that it was such as no person could have ever expected to hear within the walls of that House. It seemed to be calculated to prejudice the minds of the people against the whole Administration; and it appeared still the more extraordinary that such a speech should come from a gentleman who so lately expressed the nicest delicacy in matters of order and decency; for, in this instance, he has committed the greatest breach of decorum and propriety, by a direct censure of the Secretary of War, the President, and both Houses of the Legislature. [Here several members called Mr. DAYTON to order.] He proceeded, however, and appealed to the House, whether he had not drawn a just picture of the expressions of the gentleman from North Carolina. The very calculations which he has so laboriously produced have been questioned by other members. In regard to the surprise expressed by the gentleman at the increase of the War Department from 1791 to '92 and '93, it was not so strange that five thousand men would require greater supplies than two thousand. Yet the gentleman is surprised at the increase of expense, and seems to imply that abuses have been committed; but if an increase of expense for protecting the frontiers has accrued, the censure ought to fall on the Legislature for directing it by their laws, and not upon the Executive, who are merely the instruments for carrying them into effect.

Upon the whole, Mr. D., however he might himself be in favor of a reduction of the Army, if it stood simply on its own merits, yet, as it now struck him, it being connected with some recent circumstances, he would therefore oppose it as tending only to embarrass the Executive in their attempts towards a pacification. Moreover, he said he knew the temper of Indians so well, by having lived amongst them, that there was not a nation on earth more extravagant in their demands, when they saw the force against them was lessening. So that what is intended by the motion for reduction at present, as economical, may turn out to be, in the end, the most expensive of any.

Mr. WADSWORTH was also against the motion; and Mr. AMES closed the debate by a few observations on the necessity of committing to a Committee of the Whole, as there would be no other way of answering the industrious calculations of the mover.

The question on commitment was carried, and made the order of the day for next Wednesday.

MONDAY, December 31.

A petition of Isaiah Thomas, of Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that printing types, of foreign manufacture, imported into the United States, may be exempted from the duty imposed on them by law; and that certain bonds, to a considerable amount, given by him to the Collector of the District of Boston, for the payment of the duties on printing types already imported, may be cancelled.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of the officers of the late Massachusetts line of the Continental Army, in behalf of themselves and the soldiers of the said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the Debt granted them for military services during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend an act entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," so far as respects the coinage of copper; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of the inhabitants of St. Vincennes, on the Wabash, together with a letter from the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, accompanying the same. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the survey directed by the resolve of the late Congress of the 29th of August 1788, of the lands ceded by the State of Virginia to the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and confirmed to the French and Canadian inhabitants and other settlers of the Kaskaskias, St. Vincennes, and the neighboring villages, who, on or before the year 1783 had settled there, and had professed themselves citizens of Virginia, be made at the expense of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MUELENBERG, and Mr. LEONARD, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. GOODRUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill relative to claims against the United States not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted; which was read twice and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to explain the act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," in respect to the taking bail in criminal cases; and that Mr. WHITTE, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made some progress therein.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, be directed to lay before this House lists of the several persons employed in the offices of their respective Departments, with the salaries allowed to each.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom were referred the petitions of a number of persons, praying to be placed on the list of pensioners of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FEES IN ADMIRALTY CASES.

The bill to ascertain the fees demandable in cases of Admiralty proceedings in the Courts of the United States, being read the third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. WILLIAMSON said, the bill appeared to him to be essentially defective; one leg was cut away, and it limped badly on the other. He therefore wished it not to pass. The Judiciary System required amendment. His constituents were exposed to innumerable difficulties. Respecting seizures, they had nearly ceased, owing to the perplexities thrown in the way by the regulations of courts.

Mr. W. SMITH acknowledged the bill was not so good a one as he could have wished; but he could not conceive how any thing could limp on one leg. And its mutilated state may be attributable to the gentleman who now opposes its passage. Mr. S. did not think a sufficient reason had been given against its passage. It originated on the petition of upwards of sixty respectable merchants of the city of Charleston, who complain of the enormous fees to which they are subjected; and as the bill will afford them relief, without doing injury to any one, he hoped it would pass. The bill passed accordingly.

TUESDAY, January 1, 1793.

Mr. WHITTE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to explain an act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," in respect to taking bail in criminal cases; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. WHITTE reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the memorial of John Tucker, late Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was made on the 8th of March last. Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill providing for the allowance and payment of ——— dollars to the said John Tucker, to compensate him for his expenses and services, and for money paid by him as Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. BALDWIN, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services during the late war; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

COINAGE BILL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Copper Coinage bill, (Mr. WHITTE in the chair.) The object of this bill is to alter the weight of the copper coin as stated in the former act. After some discussion, the blanks specifying the weight of the cent and half cent were filled—the first with 8 pennyweights 16 grains, the other with 4 pennyweights 8 grains.

Mr. BOURNOR, after remarking that the artists who had exhibited specimens of the figure of Liberty on the several samples of coin which he had seen all differed in their conceptions on this occasion; for the sake, therefore, of uniformity, he moved to add a clause to the present bill, providing that, in lieu of the figure of Liberty, the head of Columbus should be substituted. Mr. B. supported his motion by some pertinent remarks on the character of Columbus, and the obligations to the citizens of the United States were under to honor his memory.

Mr. CLARK was in favor of the alteration. Mr. WILLIAMSON and Mr. LIVERMORE objected to it.

On the question being put, the motion was negatived.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill; which the House ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPORT ON PETITIONS FOR PENSIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom were referred the petitions of a number of persons praying to be placed on the list of pensioners of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then the said report being further amended, to read as follows:

"Resolved, That, in order to prevent the admission of improper claims, and to facilitate the allowance of such as are well founded, it is expedient to repeal the second, third, and fourth sections of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions,' and to provide that, in future, the claims for invalid pensions shall be regulated in the manner following, to wit:

"1st. That all evidence relative to invalids shall be taken upon oath before the Judge of the District in which such invalids reside, or before any three persons specially authorized by commission from the said Judge.

"2d. That the evidence relative to any claimant must prove decisive disability to have been the direct effect of known wounds, received while in the actual line of his duty, in the service of the United States, during the late war; that this evidence must be the affidavits of the commanding officer, or surgeon of the ship, regiment, corps, or company, in which such claimant served, or two other credible witnesses, to the same effect, setting forth the time and place of such known wound.

"3d. That every claimant shall be examined by two physicians, upon oath, to be authorized by commission from the said Judge, who shall report in writing their opinion of the nature of the said disability, and in what degree it prevents the claimant from obtaining his livelihood by labor.

"4th. That every claimant shall produce evidence of the time of his leaving the service of the United States, and of his being honorably discharged therefrom. He must also produce evidence of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county, in which he resided for the two years immediately after he left the service, as aforesaid, of the existence of his disability.

ty during that period, and ascertaining, of their own knowledge, the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support, of the claimant.

"5th. That the said claimant must produce the evidence of two credible witnesses of the continuance of his disability from the expiration of the said two years to the time of his application.

"6th. That each claimant should show a good and sufficient cause why he did not apply to the State in which he resided, on or before the 11th of December, 1788, the time limited for applications of this nature.

"7th. That the evidence of no claimant should be admitted whose case had been rejected by any State prior to the aforesaid 11th of December, 1788.

"8th. That the reasonable allowance to such commissioners and physicians aforesaid for examining the claims of invalids shall be made by the _____, and paid out of such contingent funds as the President of the United States may direct.

"Resolved, That the said Judge of the District shall transmit a list of such claims, accompanied by the evidence herein directed, to the Secretary for the Department of War, who shall examine the muster rolls and other evidences of the late war, in order to prove the services of the said claimants; and the said Secretary shall make a statement of the cases of the said claimants to Congress, with such circumstances and remarks as may be necessary, in order to enable them to take such order thereon as they may judge proper."

It was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. LEE, do prepare and bring in the same.

WEDNESDAY, January 2.

Ordered. That the memorials of the late officers and soldiers of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, which lay on the table, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on next Monday week.

An engrossed bill to amend an act entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," so far as respects the coinage of copper, was read the third time, and passed. An engrossed bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AMES, from the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Joseph Henderson, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer Cowell, which was made on the 3d of February last. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the prayer of the said petition cannot be granted.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to compensate John Tucker; which was received, read twice, and committed.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 28th ultimo for reducing the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose and observed, that he had pledged himself to the House last Friday to show that the calculations of the gentleman from North Carolina were not true; and, if true, that the inferences drawn from them were not correct. There was a material difference (he said) between the appropriations quoted by the gentleman and those which he would now read to the House. Here he read a statement which he had prepared, from which it would appear that Mr. STEELE had overrated the contingencies, hospitals, quartermasters, forage, cavalry, ordnance, pay, and subsistence, each of them.

The total difference between Mr. STEELE's and Mr. WADSWORTH's calculations, from this representation, was $27,080 dollars in the year 1790.

In like manner, Mr. W. read his calculations for 1791. On comparing which with those of Mr. STEELE, he said there was a difference in the total of $252,312; and in the total of 1792, he showed a difference of $567,530. He also particularly objected to Mr. STEELE's statements of the ordnance expense for 1793, which had been called $23,000; but that sum, although it comes under the head of ordnance in the estimate, is not altogether appropriated for the purchase of cannon; the whole amount of the expense of cannon, he said, had been very trifling,—about $700 or $800. Having proceeded thus far in attempting to controvert the calculations of the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. W. said, it would indeed have been an alarming thing to the United States, had they been founded in reality. But the gentleman had not confined himself to misstatements—he had gone further; for he had "lamented the necessity of quoting even truths from that office"—the War Office. Here Mr. W. stated that the quotation which Mr. STEELE had made from a report of the Secretary of War had not been correctly quoted. After Mr. W. had thus represented Mr. STEELE's calculations as erroneous, and his quotations as misstated, he said that the House ought to beware of not being led astray by them. He next observed, that the gentleman had laid a great deal of blame of the present hostilities between the United States and the Indians, and the expense attending them, to the War Department. But Mr. W. conceived that there were other causes to be assigned for the Indian war, There had never been a day, from the first settlement of America to the present moment, without our being at war with the Indians, in one place or another. The history of the country, the resolves of the old Congress, every book published by Congress, show this to have been the case. [Here he read some quotations from the resolves of 1784, to show the appropriations for defraying the expenses of Indian wars.] He wished the House to take a retrospect of the subject, from the beginning of those troubles down to the late application for assistance from the National Government by the Governor of Georgia. Although they have three thousand men on the frontier of that State, yet it is not found sufficient, and the Indians have driven them in. Indeed, there has been a time when the town of Savannah has been obliged to keep a guard.

It was not his intention to introduce commendations of the officer at the head of the War Department, but he thought it proper to observe, that he is not to be blamed on account of the expenses referred to. He is no more than an instrument acting under the Supreme Executive. It is the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES who has found it necessary and proper to recommend the establishment of a military force. It is, therefore, not the Secretary's, it is the PRESIDENT's war; and to assert that the Secretary has had any undue influence with the Legislature, would be altogether false; for, on the contrary, his reports have been treated with disrespect in this House. Was not his report at New York ridiculed, and called "preaching," &c., because it was in favor of peace, and spoke with great humanity respecting the hardships often inflicted by the whites on the Indians? Indeed, the Secretary of War has been uniform in his endeavors to bring about a durable peace. This, however desirable an object, has been found hitherto impracticable, and the Indians have lately carried their depredations to so great a length that the President has judged it necessary to repel them by force. They have murdered in cold blood our ambassadors of peace, whilst holding a flag of truce in one hand and reaching the other out in friendship to the Indians. Perhaps they may have been excited to this degree of barbarity by many causes. It is hard to determine which are the greatest aggressors—the settlers on the frontiers or the Indians. The murder of the Moravian Indians, the proclamation of Congress against our own people, all show that the Indians have ground for complaint.

Here Mr. W. recapitulated the affairs of the banditti at Fort St. Vincennes; the representations of Judge Innes, of Kentucky, from 1783 to 1790, respecting the people there who could not be restrained from the commission of crimes against the peace of the country. From these causes and the common fatality of the times, our attempts towards peace have proved abortive, and the war has been prolonged, but the Secretary is entirely innocent of promoting it.

In regard to the other arguments of the gentleman [Mr. STEELE] respecting the militia, that they would afford either a cheaper or better defence for the frontiers, he had his doubts.

Mr. W. now went over the whole history of the frontier wars; a line of posts was once established and garrisoned by militia, yet they could not prevent the Indians from coming within sixty miles of Winchester, and murdering, scalping, and plundering the women and children. After the peace of 1762, the Indians drove in the militia, and advanced as far as Cumberland and Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania.

But Colonel Boquet, with the remains of two regiments of regular troops, who had just before arrived from the West Indies, marched against the savages, and hired pack-horses to carry some of his sick men. With these regulars, Colonel Boquet fought them and drove them with the bayonet from one end of the country to the other. The battle began at one o'clock the first day and lasted until night, and was renewed the next morning with superior force by the Indians; yet they were entirely discomfited. This news went to Fort Pitt and Virginia, and revived the spirits of the country. Virginia raised more troops—and Colonel Boquet dictated a peace to the savages.

These instances furnished sufficient arguments to show the superiority of regular troops over militia. But he could mention many others, viz: General Hartman, with eight hundred chosen men, giving a total defeat to the Indians; Colonel Willet's attack and defeat of them; and General Sullivan's affair in South Carolina.

As to the defeat of Harman and St. Clair, their men ought not to be reckoned regular troops. They were raw recruits, undisciplined, &c. But even they stood better than the militia; for the militia ran away, and those who remained to fight the savages fell, to their honor be it spoken, whilst the militia, who were the advanced guard, ran and threw away their guns, bay, their coats.

Upon the whole, the balance of argument, Mr. W. thought, must appear in favor of regular troops.

He further took occasion to animadvert on what Mr. Williamson had said, when that gentleman expressed himself so strongly in favor of the militia under Major Adair. That officer, Mr. W. observed, had been a Continental officer, and from his own words, it appeared that he had no very great opinion of the militia, for they had fled to the garrison; and the Indians obtained their ends, notwithstanding the reception given by Major Adair. There was the triumph, and when they retired, it seems to have been not so much a matter of necessity, as a thing of choice, on their part. The loss of horses, one hundred, perhaps, and the expense of this affair, amounted to a much greater sum than any regular troops would have cost. The party under Major Adair, supposing it to consist of a hundred men, cost one hundred dollars a day, reckoning the attendant circumstances—and considering it, as Mr. W. did, a complete defeat—for there are no circumstances to prove that it was otherwise—the militia having deserted him and left the few regulars he had exposed to the whole of the danger.

Mr. W. did not stop here in his details of militia disgraces—he recounted many other cases. He mentioned the Grant's expedition against the Cherokee, &c. And still he drew a balance against the successes of the militia; for, he said, they had constantly been defeated, and the country left exposed to the depredations of the enemy.

Much has been said, observed Mr. W., of Clark and Sevier's successes. They, indeed, afford an exception to the cases above mentioned; but how far were they successful? The immense expense of men and money, and the interruption given to the agriculture of the country by calling away from their business so many industrious citizens, is a thing beyond the power of calculation; for my part, said he, I do not know figures enough to count it up. For the truth of this position, and for the enormous waste and expense incurred by militia, he appealed to one of the members [Col. PARKER] on the other side of the House, who had experience in the matter, whether it was not absolutely impossible either to bring militia under proper discipline, or prevent their enormous waste. A whole brigade of regular troops would not cost so much as one regiment of militia, to a country. The militia of Kentucky have cost more blood and wealth than all the American war; when the circumstances are considered of calling out men from the tillage of the field, &c. It is enormous the number of lives, and the aggregate loss is countless. The causes of these things are, want of order and discipline, &c. And those causes have produced an universal reprobation of the war establishment; but all those who condemn, are not well acquainted with those causes; they judge from hearing only one-half of the truth in our newspapers. It is supposed a peace can be easily effected, but I know of no peace that has not been effected by force; for, although promises have been made and peace often treated for with the Indians, yet they have constantly broken those promises. This is a good reason for keeping up the present force of the United States. We are now able to meet the Indians and demand a safe peace. But the gentleman from North Carolina calls our establishment a mere military parade, which it is said by another gentleman [Mr. PARKER] will only tend to rouse the Spaniards and the British, &c.

He went on quoting the conduct of the Indians and their threatening manner, when they told you, "go to your own side of the Ohio," &c. What language do they now hold out? But I am not at liberty, said Mr. W., to mention it, as it was confidentially communicated to this House, and read with our doors shut. However, it is well known to all the members present, the insolence of that language. For my part, I have little hopes of a peace from any promises of the Indians; and although a negotiation is said to be upon the carpet, I can never depend upon the promises of savages who have so often broken them.

In speaking of the recruits that have been lately raised for the regular army, Mr. W. opposed his opinion to that of Mr. PARKER, who mentioned them in such contemptible terms as having been collected from the stews and brothels of the cities, &c. For his part, Mr. W. had often seen them, and he believed they were equal, if not superior in spirit and appearance, to most of the soldiery during the British war, and better than the soldiery were at the close of the war, with some exceptions, such as respects the men who cost £300 each. Before he could quit the subject, he begged leave to mention another instance of the efficacy of regular troops; it was the affair of General Wayne's surprise, when the light-horse dismounted, and cut the militia to pieces, and the infantry drove them off at the point of the bayonet.

He ridiculed the idea of calling out a militia upon every emergency. Where are they to be formed? In Pennsylvania it would be attended with a tenfold loss, if they must quit their daily labor. He would admit that the character of the Kentucky militia had been brave and intrepid; but there was still occasion for a new war, and no ultimate protection afforded to the frontier.

The Governor of North Carolina had complained of a friendly Indian being murdered, &c. On the whole, he thought it improper to take militia to fight Indian warriors. He admitted that some abuses might have been practised in the regular army, but they were as little, if not less, than in any other army he could remember.

He insisted that the scheme of the Department of War was not a scheme of the Secretary, but a scheme of the United States from the President down to the members of the Legislature, and the means of the great skill of the President after Braddock's defeat. The President must be the best judge of the disposition of Indians, and the best way of treating with them; he approves the scheme of the present war, and shall we imprudently attempt to change his plan, by sending out a few men to be knocked on the head by the Indians, as those coat men were? so called by the gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr. PARKER,] but instead of coat-men, he Mr. W. thought they might also have been called petty-coat men, &c. He finished his observations by again remarking, that the calculations of the gentleman [Mr. STEELE] who had introduced the motion for reducing the present war establishments were founded in error, and ought not to have any weight with the House.

Mr. STEELE.—When the House have deliberated upon the merits of the gentleman's arguments and the truth of my statements; and when they have decided the question, I will submit to their decision; but, in the mean time, I insist that my calculations are founded on the reports of the Secretary and the public printed documents on the table, of the appropriations and laws, &c. I wish the gentleman [Mr. WADSWORTH,] had told us where he has found those papers, from which he attempts to controvert such authentic documents as I have quoted. I wish he had made the House understand them; for my part, they appear unintelligible.

Mr. WADSWORTH said it was from the laws. Mr. STEELE explained some things in his former statements; and in reply to some suggestions that might be thrown out with respect to his indelicate mode of attacking the Secretary of War, or the President, he denied any member to show that he had acted beyond the line of his duty; or that he had ever shown any disrespect toward the President. On the contrary, he was of opinion that that gentleman's character would for ever be secured against all the possible attacks of ingratitude or malice, &c. He also used some other very handsome expressions on this occasion. But whilst he was ready to declare these things, and to prove that he had no personal intentions of injuring the Secretary of War; yet, he would not suffer himself to be deprived of his privilege, whilst he had the honor of a seat in that House; and, in the present instance, he thought it his duty to hold up his opposition against the rapid increase of expenses in all the Departments of Government, which he said were grown to an enormous burden upon the people, and unwarranted by the Constitution; that they, therefore, ought to be immediately checked. He hoped, for the future, gentlemen would confine their arguments to measures, and not apply them to persons. He sat down, for the present, with this proviso: that he would reserve to himself the right of answering to what might be advanced against his proposition, which he could prove to be salutary; and that the present system is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. HARTLEY was against adopting the motion under the present circumstances of the country, and he entered into a particular investigation of the merits of the question. When the last law for the more effectual protection of the frontiers passed, the subject now under consideration was very fully and ably discussed, and the gentlemen who were averse to the augmentation had several alterations made to satisfy them.

Instead of the President's being obliged to raise the whole of the three regiments, he was to exercise his discretion either to make the augmentation complete, or raise a part, and he had authority to disband them after being raised. The 12th section of that law is thus expressed: "It shall be lawful for the President of the United States to forbear to raise, or to disband after they shall be raised, the whole or any part of the said three additional regiments, in case events shall in his judgment render his so doing consistent with the public safety."

We should therefore consider whether circumstances have so materially changed since that time as to render it proper that the Legislature should interfere, repeal the powers given to the President, and discharge the three regiments. This necessarily leads us first to view the situation of our finances, and the state of the frontiers at and immediately before the time of passing the law. The extent of our revenue was not as well known then as at present, and every good man deprecated the misfortune which obliged him to increase the taxes. The war was a disagreeable one, but necessary, if peace could not otherwise be obtained. The Legislature considered the expense, and were of opinion that we had means and abilities to defray the same. Many murders and ravages had been committed by the savages on the frontiers. One army had suffered in the year 1790, and nearly a whole army cut off on the 4th of November, 1791. And we had every reason to suppose that the Indians would act in great force against us. Our finances are still respectable. It is true, I should be happy if we could apply the money toward discharging the national debt already contracted, but the unfortunate situation of our frontiers prevent it. War, though an evil, may (from the present disposition of the world) be sometimes necessary, when nations are unreasonable and justice cannot be otherwise obtained.

Hostilities have lately been committed on our troops commanded by Major Adair, and several of the Southern tribes show themselves inimical, and we have no absolute assurances that we shall have peace in the Spring. The agreement by some tribes to a suspension of hostilities, was only convenient to them as it protected their families for the Winter.

The great object of the additional armament was to obtain peace: this is not yet effected. May we promise ourselves more success in negotiation by laying down our arms, or by retaining them? History is in favor of the latter. Indeed I hold it as a maxim, that the nation which is prepared for war can most easily obtain peace. For my own part, I can discover no existing causes for altering the system established by the act to which I have before referred. The expense has been made a very serious objection. It ought to have weight; but where measures have been proper, America has not regarded it. She has freely expended her treasure to support her rights. We are bound in justice and honor to protect our fellow-citizens on the frontiers; we demand from them an excuse. They require from the General Government protection. I am for making peace with all the Indians upon reasonable terms; but any country which has been fairly purchased from the Indians, they should not be permitted to repossess or hold by conquest. If an offensive war be necessary, says the gentleman from North Carolina, regular troops are not the most proper to carry it on. They are more expensive, and unfit to meet the savages of the wilderness. As to the expense, I have partly answered before. But if the gentleman is to have five expeditions in one year, I believe he would find that his calculations are not correct: a misfortune to either detachments or party would bear very hard upon the district they came from; the partial loss of regulars would not be equally felt, very few of them having families.

I have a high opinion of the backwoods rifle-men, but I am confident that we cannot certainly rely upon their turning out as often as they might be wanted; we could not rely on such uncertainty; and yet this is offered as a favorite project. If you cannot rely upon them, you may say that the ordinary militia can be drafted. You would find them unfit for such a service; they would in general be composed of substitutes, inexperienced and undisciplined, and it would be unfair to take them all from the frontiers, and some of the States, or at least one, have no militia laws. I am for retaining the regular troops.

The President has practised economy in organizing the troops voted for, and I am told they have made considerable progress in discipline; they are formed into legionary corps, composed of horse, riflemen, light-infantry, and battalion-men. The three former will be fit for active service in the field, the latter for the common duties in the camp or garrison. I will allow volunteers and militia their full credit; but I do not think the regular troops merit the disparagement attempted. Volunteer corps have not been free from misfortunes. Colonel Crawford, at the head of five hundred volunteers from Virginia and Pennsylvania, was defeated in the Western country, and he was burnt at the stake. General Braddock, it is said, was obstinate, and his European troops were undisciplined for such a service. The army under General St. Clair was lost, because the men were undisciplined and unfitted for that service. I can mention several instances where regular troops have successfully penetrated the Indian country, among warlike tribes, with success: Colonel Montgomery, into the Cherokees; Colonel Armstrong, to the Kittanog; Colonel Boquet's campaign of 1763 and 1764. Three detachments of the American army, in the year 1778, (one under the command of General Broadhead, one under Lieutenant Colonel Butler, and the last commanded by your humble servant,) penetrated the country possessed by the Six Nations. Neither of the detachments was large, and the last had to contend against superior numbers. In General Sullivan's campaign, the year following, his van-guard beat an equal, if not a superior number of Indians. I might mention the Roman legions: they almost constantly were successful against those they called Barbarians, until their enemies adopted the Roman discipline. I have a high opinion of the personal bravery and prowess of an Indian, but I do deny that they can act to the best advantage in large bodies. They have not an experience of that kind; disciplined troops would have the advantage. I reprobate the idea of a standing army, which might endanger the liberty of this country; but I consider the troops contemplated in the act of Congress to be absolutely necessary, until peace shall be obtained, and therefore shall vote against a reduction. Every step has been taken, and I dare say will be taken, by the President, to procure a peace without bloodshed. Our messengers of peace have, in some places, been murdered; and yet he has sent messengers to others.

Mr. CLARK.—One would suppose, from the style of the debate, that we were going to abandon the frontiers, the safety of the country, &c., and to disband the whole of the army: for, the arguments of those gentlemen who are opposed to the motion seem to be calculated to mislead the House, in that way, and to prove that the question under consideration is for reducing the whole of the troops now existing. But this is so far from being the true state of the matter, that it is not even contemplated to disband a single man of them; it only goes to the prevention of raising any more troops, which, perhaps, would be the safest policy under the present circumstances and temper of the United States. There are about three thousand and three hundred effective men already raised, who are sufficient to garrison the forts on the frontier, agreeably to the gentleman's statement who introduced the motion; and, indeed, it seems as if they were fully competent, if we believe the report that the whole of the Indian force, at the time of meeting General St. Clair, and when they exerted themselves to the utmost, was but one thousand two hundred warriors.

Mr. C. made some further remarks on the sentiments which had been expressed by the gentleman last up; and, in speaking of the discretionary powers vested in the President, he was of opinion that the situation of the Chief Magistrate in this respect was extremely delicate: for, supposing he might be inclined to stop the recruiting service, and reduce the war establishment; and supposing the frontiers to be again harassed, it might be charged to him for not having kept up the legal complement of men. Under this impression, Mr. C. wished that some way could be adopted of conveying to the President the sentiments of the Legislature on this subject, without the tedious form of a law.

Mr. PARKER.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARTLEY] has been reading a section of the law, to inform us of the discretionary powers vested in the President, which we have heard from other members before he rose, and which we all knew as well as himself. I am sorry to hear gentlemen, when they have no other resource of argument left, so often resorting to the name of the President, to carry their measures; and yet, in the present instance, I much doubt whether those sentiments are avowed by the President, which have been laid to his charge in the course of this debate; however, if they were really so, this is not a sufficient reason to silence me, or to prevent me from delivering my own sentiments, and those of my constituents who sent me here to do so. He vindicated the character of the militia, in opposition to the disgraceful picture which Mr. WASHINGTON had painted of this respectable class of citizens, whom he (Mr. P.) insisted were always more spirited soldiery, and fitter for fighting the Indians than the regulars, although they did not always move at the sound of a trumpet or beat of a drum, which were necessary to rouse the attention of heart-broken, mercenary troops, who seldom act but from force, or fear of the whipping-post. Militia were not so well acquainted with military show, or the display of columns; neither did the President of the United States, when acting Major of a regiment little better than militia, find that the doctrine of tactics were of any great service to him.

Mr. P. further mentioned, that the forerunner's of General Burgoyne's army were taken by General Stark's militia near Bennington; and the capture of the whole of Burgoyne's army was chiefly brought about by militia, as General Lincoln had very few regular troops at the time of his surrender. In short, the militia bore a conspicuous share of almost every engagement during the war. At Trenton, the men who took the Hessians were little other than militia, as they had been raised but a short time before. Mr. P. could vouch for them, as he was a witness of their activity and bravery. Another instance offered of their success at Charleston, after it was taken by the British and the regulars drove off; the militia kept possession of the country and supported themselves. He also remembered having been called away from the regular army in the North to take the command of some militia in Virginia, who supported themselves for twelve months without either pay or provisions from the United States; and yet they were never once defeated or disgraced, neither did they leave the country unprotected and exposed; and all they received for their services was certificates which necessity obliged them to alienate at three shillings in the pound, to persons who are now in possession of them, drawing an annual interest of nearly as much, and who never perhaps had a good wish toward the Revolution. He next quoted the militia under Colonel Mercer, at Yorktown, who were successful in a skirmish with the enemy under Tarleton. These and several other arguments in favor of the militia, whom he still maintained to be the best security of a country, were used by Mr. P. He would not advocate the raising them from all parts of the United States, but only in such places as the safety of the frontiers required it most: they were not, to be sure, accustomed to the display of the column, &c., but they knew how to take the Indians in a proper way through the woods.

It gave him pain to hear the character of the militia so much traduced, and it also was a painful reflection to think of the two disgraceful defeats of our armies under Generals Harmar and St. Clair; indeed, it would have a strange appearance to the world, to think that this country is inhabited by the same men who lived in 1776. He repeated what he had before asserted, that most of the present regulars were collected from the stewards and brothers of the cities, and had none of the spirit or principles of the honest yeomanry, who composed the militia during former wars, when every man turned out impressed with a good cause.

It was not, he said, his desire to criminate any individual in office, although he would maintain his right of expressing his opinion on that floor, so long as he held a seat in the House. But with regard to myself, said he, I am not disposed to pour incense into any man's cup; I respect the President as much as any man, and think him incapable of doing wrong, at least on those principles that foreign despots are supposed to do no wrong, because the people are their subjects, and dare not to say their Sovereigns do wrong, and dare not contradict this tyrannic maxim. If the House, or if the President, have committed an error, they ought to correct it; for my part, I conceived the whole of the plan wrong from the beginning. From the present appearances, he was convinced we should get no peace with the Indians, unless it were dictated by the British agents in Canada; for it was clear, as long as they can do us the injustice to withhold territory from us, we can have little reason to expect their aid or friendship in bringing about a peace which is so desirable. He hoped to live to see the day that America will be able to show herself superior to her enemies, and chastise them: at present, it would be improper to engage in any war, if it could be avoided.

In addition to the foregoing reasons offered by Mr. P. for being opposed to a war establishment, he also remarked, that it was from a desire to see the public debt redeemed without resorting to new taxes; for if they once should get fixed there, (pointing up to the Senate Chamber,) we should never be able to withdraw them, whether they were necessary or not. He concluded by a hearty wish that the motion made by his friend from North Carolina might succeed.

Mr. Boudinot was against the motion, as he thought any immediate alteration of the present system would be attended with dangerous consequences, under the present circumstances of the United States. He did not think it would be justifiable to alter it. It would show an instability in our public measures, especially at this moment, when we have done everything to bring about a peace with the hostile Indians: and, when it is just advancing to the season for effecting it—when it is at the eve of completion—shall we rashly counteract the whole? and after having brought the enemy, who were so much elated on account of their recent success, to a proper sense of our power and force to impose an honorable peace, would it not be extremely imprudent to lessen our own consequence before we have accomplished the object? The Indians would, in this case, most indubitably raise their demands in proportion to what they supposed to be our weakness. Mr. B. added several other observations.

Mr. Willis had always been strongly impressed with a dislike for standing armies; but when he considered the situation of the frontiers, and particularly of the State of Georgia, he must give his vote against the motion. Neither did he think two regiments by any means a sufficient force, even to garrison the posts.

On motion, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing a list of the several persons employed in his office, with the salary allowed to each, pursuant to the resolution of this House of the thirty-first ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THURSDAY, January 3.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions: which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing a list of the persons employed in the several offices of his Department, with the salary allowed to each, pursuant to the resolution of this House, of the 31st ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The order of the day being called for, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WHITE in the Chair,) on Mr. STEELE's motion for reducing part of the present military establishment of the United States.

In reply to the speech made yesterday by Mr. WADSWORTH, and which had been expressed in such strong language, Mr. STEELE thought it necessary to make a few observations, as a preliminary, before the House went further into the debate.

The gentleman from Connecticut had disputed the calculations which he, Mr. S., had produced. Perhaps the gentleman's calculations may be right, and perhaps both of our statements may be so; but with respect to those which I produced, if the acts of Congress are false, if the reports and estimates of the Heads of Departments on your table, Mr. SPEAKER, are false, then my statements are wrong, or "untrue" as the gentleman expressed it, and for which, I hope, on more cool reflection, he will not adhere to. Mr. S. then read the acts of Congress of the 29th of September, 1789, 26th of March, 1790, and 12th of August, same year; the 11th of February, 1791, and 23d December, 1792, &c., from which he clearly proved that every item of his calculations was exactly quoted. He knew of no surplusage unexpended at the War Department, but $140,000, as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury; if any gentlemen in the House knew of any other, he hoped they would mention them. For his part, he thought they would mention them. For very little savings any where from the grants of the preceding year, but it contained demands for new grants much larger than for any former year. This, however, was a subject he did not at present mean to say much on, until he should hear the sentiments of other members. He therefore sat down with a reservation, that he would take the liberty of replying to such arguments as might be adduced against his proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH disavowed any intention of being indelicate in his expressions yesterday, toward the gentleman from North Carolina; and if he had, in the warmth of debate, said anything to which that gentleman could take offence, it was not meant so, and he was ready to retract it. He could not, however, avoid taking notice, that the gentleman's arguments appeared to him to convey a strong censure on the Executive, and to spread abroad improper impressions. The principal error which he dwelt on, was that of quoting the difference between the appropriations of 1789 and 1790, to be so great as appeared from that gentleman's statement. But the fact is, that the gentleman had overlooked the laws, and instead of quoting the amount of the two appropriations made in 1789, he had only mentioned the amount of one, consequently this was giving an improper impression of the real comparative appropriations of those two years; for, when they are taken in the whole, the difference is not so great, nor the increase so much as Mr. STEELE exhibited it, by $27,080. In like manner, the comparative increases of the other years, 1791, 1792, and 1793, have been misstated, and the truth is, that the total increases are not less, but more than the gentleman represented them by the sum of $567,530 72.

Mr. CLARK hoped the gentleman last up did not suppose that the House was going to war with the Secretary of War. He sincerely wished that some means should be adopted of conveying the sense of the House to the President, who would thereby be considerably relieved from the delicate situation in which he now stands with regard to the discretionary powers vested in him. Before Mr. C. sat down, he suggested the idea of filling up the blank in Mr. STEELE's motion, with the word three, so as to limit the military to three regiments.

Mr. MILLIDGE liked the spirit of the motion, in regard to the prevention of standing armies; but he was against its being put in practice at the present time. He differed from the gentleman from New Jersey, and as his motion had not a second he would proceed. He wished the question under consideration to go to a Committee of the Whole, that a fair and open discussion of every point of the important subject might be brought into view. The situation of the State he had the honor to represent, had been mentioned in the course of debate; he therefore felt himself called on to deliver his sentiments; that he was persuaded there was not a member in the House who more ardently wished for peace than himself, or who would go further to promote so desirable an object, as putting an end to a savage war, and an enormous public expense; but he was of opinion that the reduction of the military establishment would not answer either of those purposes; that it well became members to take into consideration such parts of the Union as lay exposed, and then judge the propriety of the intended measure; that it was well known that Georgia was a frontier State, bordering on one side by a nation with whom a just understanding and intercourse still remains to be settled by treaty, and on the other by a warlike tribe of Indians, the most numerous of any on the Continent, ten thousand warriors, besides the Cherokee nation of three thousand and five hundred. A State, in proportion to its wealth, and in proportion to what it contributes to the General Government, of the fewest inhabitants, an extent of frontier from the river St. Mary to the northernmost line, full three hundred miles—a country hardly at any period enjoying perfect safety, since the commencement of the Revolution. My constituents, said he, adopted the Federal system, from a hope that we should be protected: some of them, at this moment, have never been able to return to their habitations, which they left at the commencement of the war; and I am warranted in saying that a part of my constituents are now throughout the State under arms. Let members for a moment place their constituents in the situation of mine, and let me ask them if they would not demand the protecting arm of Government? As yet we have experienced little more than the enforcing a treaty, that has not been complied with on the part of the British, which has reduced some of our first citizens to a state of dependence on those who not long ago were their avowed and open enemies, and a deprivation of our territorial right, for the yielding of which a permanent peace and permanent line were to be established. Of the peace we have experienced no great share, and as for the permanent line it still remains to be run, and, from well grounded information, the half-way conduct of the Creeks the other day with Mr. Seagrave, gives very little reason to expect it. Such was the situation of his State. But to the point, he was of opinion that we set out wrong in warring with the Indians at any rate. Unfortunately for us, the event has not answered the design, and we are now reduced to that state that hardly any change can mend. The unaccountable success of the Indians has so elated them with their prowess, and which likewise has presented views to the English and Spanish they never dreamed of, and the federated situation of the different tribes occasioned him not to hesitate in pronouncing that the several frontier States would be more or less exposed to the cruel ravages of a savage warfare. If the customs of savage tribes did not direct them towards us, they were incessantly excited by the British and Spaniards to amuse us with false pretences of peace, while they were engrossing the advantages of their trade. The aged Indians kept their hunting, and the young men were gratified in the military exploits with the blood of our fellow-citizens. In this situation the frontier of the United States, a distance of not less than fifteen hundred miles, must be garrisoned. He left it to gentlemen to calculate what force would be required for that purpose, if troops should be employed in no other way. Militia, he said, were for sudden invasion; they were scattered when they returned, and must be protected while at home. The jealousy of the English, and their augmenting their force, surely ought not to occasion the reduction of any part of ours; if anything, it ought to have a contrary effect. He likewise said that it would be necessary to view the early history of our country, and find what had been the conduct of Spaniards and Indians about the commencement of the present century. The Spaniards, at the same spot where they now are, by their treachery, when they were at peace with the English, at a time when the Carolinians little suspected, when they imagined they were in perfect alliance with the Indians, the Yamassees, Creeks, and Cherokees, those Indians, by their instigation, massacred one hundred and thirty of their inhabitants, and drove the rest into Charleston. The inhabitants of the capital of Georgia are as much exposed as the Carolinians then were; a distance of twenty miles from Savannah, places them in an open, uninhabited country, to the Creek nation, and within that twenty miles, thinly inhabited on account of the nature of their cultivation. What had happened, he said, might happen again: the Spaniards had not changed their policy. If, therefore, we are forewarned, ought we not to be forearmed? That, from their dangerous situation, even on a peace establishment, there ought to be at least five hundred troops on that frontier.

If public officers have misapplied the public money, the Constitution pointed out a mode to punish them. The Government belongs to the people; the officers are their servants, we are their Representatives, and we ought to do them justice. He conceived it was praiseworthy in any member to afford any aid or information in his power to bring these things to light; that he felt it his duty to make strict inquiry into the expenditure of public money; that he was sent by his constituents to protect their property, and in doing that should vote against the present proposition.

Mr. FINDLEY observed that a difference of opinion existed in respect to the motion for reducing the Army. The mover was for filling up the blank with two regiments; but Mr. CLARK had proposed three, and was against discharging any of those already enlisted. The principle of the motion was what he wished to speak to. Passing by the comparative view, so much alluded to in the course of the debate, of militia and regulars, he struck at once into the heart of the question. The redemption of the public debt, from the savings to be made by the reduction of the Army, seemed to be a principal object with some members, but, in his opinion, it was no more than a secondary one: the defence of the frontier is of superior concern.

The origin of the war goes much farther back than that of the present Government; it arose out of the war with Britain; and it has been ever since changing for the worse, until it has at length assumed a very alarming complexion; for it has united a greater number of tribes than has ever been known, and it has exposed a much greater extent of our frontier. With regard to the mismanagement or abuses, if any there were, it was no place to discuss such subjects by desultory debates in this House, whilst there were other modes open. He did not, however, believe that any material abuses had taken place indeed. This war is not one of the faults chargeable to the Executive, for it might with more justice, perhaps, be said to have had its origin in the ineffectual measures of the Legislature. The first Congress assembled under the present Government found the Union in a state of war; and although one regiment was stationed at Pittsburgh, yet the militia were not relieved from actual service. But the lately raised troops may perhaps be found more effectual, as it is said there is an excellent system of discipline established amongst them.

With regard to the argument that the Union cannot support so heavy an expense by new taxes, he was of opinion that every consideration ought to give way to the safety and protection of the country.

A particular plan is set into operation for accomplishing a peace, and it ought not to be arrested without a trial being made. The ill-defined law authorizing the President to call out the militia, and the levies under General Harmar, did not answer the end intended, for the time of their enlistment had nearly expired ere they had reached their destination; but if General Harmar had carried out two regiments of permanent troops, he could, without the assistance of the militia, have destroyed all the Indian towns and villages that stood in his way, and he would have completed the object of erecting a line of posts which would secure a lasting peace; but from the weakness of the force and the inefficiency of the law, the purpose was arrested at a critical moment, and the vengeance of the Indians roused to the utmost pitch; instead of their fears being alarmed, the next step of raising another regiment was of a piece with the former weak policy; for the encouragement was insufficient, and the miserable two-dollar men who were raised for a six months' service—their fate is too well known, and will be long remembered. They arrived at the wilderness with clothing that lasted only to the time they reached the scene of action, and those who were not cut off by the enemy were left to starve with cold in the most inclement season.

The fatal catastrophe of this campaign has only served to elate the Indians, and render them insolent, as appears from their treatment of our messengers under flags of truce. The parsimony on those occasions has been the cause of a double expense.

In opposition to this, it may be said that those parsimonious plans were recommended by the Executive, and only enacted into laws by the Legislature. This, however, if it were the fact, is no apology for the Legislature, for they have no right to cast their Legislative responsibility upon the Executive Department; nor can they do it without a breach of trust towards their constituents. The members knew that the encouragement of pay and time of enlistments would never answer any good purpose; the want of resources could have been no reason for that parsimony towards the defence of the frontiers, because it is known that we found revenue enough not only to pay the interest of the public debt, and to support the Government, but even to pay the debts of the individual States. The conviction of these mistakes induced Congress, at last, to make adequate provision, and now an attempt is made to withdraw the means before the end is accomplished. The other branch of the Legislature has prevented us from giving higher wages to encourage the recruiting service; but notwithstanding all this, it appears to go on with considerable success.

Here he mentioned something of the confidential communications which he was not now at liberty to explain. The gentleman who says that two regiments are sufficient to garrison the forts, ought to consider that garrisoning those, is not the only object in contemplation. If we expect to exist as a nation we must protect the whole frontier, and make it the interest of the Indians to be at peace with us.

But do gentlemen consider the consequences of throwing all internal defence and distant expeditions upon the militia? Is it not enough that they already stand as a picket guard to their brethren who live at ease; that they eat their bread in the fear of their lives, and are frequently embittered with the view of mournful incidents; but that we must lay a deliberate plan for increasing the number of their fatherless children and childless parents?

To say that those States who have frontiers, ought to be left to protect themselves, is a very anti-Federal sentiment, which he was sorry to hear advanced in that House. Neither is it generous to say we will pay the expense, and let them fight for us. Do gentlemen contemplate to what issue these principles would lead? Do they not observe that the fate of the Government is deeply involved in the decision? Perhaps I may be asked, Did not the States depend chiefly upon their own exertion for the defence of the frontiers under the old Congress? Yes, they did, and were better protected than since that period. But let it be recollected that at the time the States had the command of their own resources, and the laying and executing their own plans, that the Indians were not so formidably combined. But that since the States had not the power of retaliating, nor the means of gratifying with presents; since the Indians have been solemnly told to look away from the little fires of the States, to the great fire of the Union, they have looked upon us as a more formidable and dangerous foe, and made their arrangements accordingly, and European nations, and emissaries among them, have improved upon the circumstance, and excited and aided them in their union and exertions.

He made some further remarks on the impolicy of oppressing the militia at Marietta, &c., and asked if it were possible that those unfortunate few could be able to protect the whole frontier against the united force of the Indians?

He agreed with those who said that the sense of the people of America was in favor of peace; but the question is come to this. It is not to begin a war that we have raised this army, but to procure a peace, and so soon as this end is attained, the Army will be discharged. It is raised to protect, not to oppress, or to aid in governing our citizens. I know, said he, that standing armies have always been sources of oppression and aids of tyranny. Our people may long be governed without such aids; their situation will not admit of abuses from standing armies, nor would the citizens submit to them.

He was confident that the Army would be discharged by the next Legislature, as soon as a prospect of our affairs will admit it. The present prospects were not of a very flattering nature, and therefore it was good policy to keep up the force at the present crisis; and it would be dangerous to repeal the law under the circumstances.

The present Indian war is essentially different from any former one. When Britain and France divided North America betwixt them, if the emissaries of both excited the Indians to war, the power of both afforded protection. When Britain became possessed of the Western posts, and many tribes of Indians commenced a war, the British Government conducted the war, carried it into the Indian country, and by the dread of their arms procured peace; but the Indians were not then supported by other Powers. In the present war, the Indians who at that time knew nothing of us, have combined to make it a common cause; and no superior Powers interest themselves in our favor. No: they conceive our interest to be inimical to theirs. But if they did not receive encouragement, protection, and supplies from our superior neighbors, a peace would soon be procured. The gentlemen who support this resolution know well how that matter stands, and they know explanations here are not convenient. He concluded by declaring that he could not vote for the motion.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4.

SAMUEL STERRETT, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians under the sanction of flags of truce; and the same being read, some were agreed to and others disagreed to. And then the said bill, being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing lists of the persons employed in the several offices of his Department, with the salary allowed to each; also, a Letter accompanying certain statements relative to foreign loans, which have been made by the United States, under the authority of the President, pursuant to the resolutions of this House of the 24th and 27th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5.

A petition of the inhabitants of the city of Hudson, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences under which they labor, from being obliged to register, enter, and clear their vessels at the port of New York, and praying that the said city of Hudson may be made a port of entry. Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

An engrossed bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce, was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the copy of a message of Complanter and New Arrow to Major General Wayne, dated the 8th of December last, relative to the measures which they have taken to conclude a Peace, on behalf of the United States, with certain tribes of hostile Indians; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 28th ultimo, for reducing the military establishment of the United States:

Mr. MOORE said, that there was not sufficient information before the House respecting the prospect of a peace, to warrant a sudden reduction of the Army. He referred to the abuses which had been hinted at in some of the branches dependent on the War Establishment, but he did not believe there had been any worth much notice. He also mentioned the abstruseness of attempting an investigation into the origin of the war—whether the frontier settlers, or the Indians, were in fault, was a difficult thing to determine; but from many circumstances, it appeared to him, the white people were often guilty of committing depredations. This was, in his opinion, a good reason why the protection of those frontiers should not be intrusted to the militia that would be raised there. Shall we intrust the conduct of that matter to the very persons whom it has been alleged are often the aggressors? Can the PRESIDENT, at the distance he is situated from the Western Territory, check all the irregular proceedings that might happen amongst such a militia? There were two obvious reasons for passing the law of the 5th of March, 1792, for the protection of the frontiers by regular forces. First, it could not be expected that militia would always prove successful against the Indians, because the latter are gaining more experience every day in the mode of warfare, and there can be no dependence on a treaty between those militia and the Indians. The second reason was, that the PRESIDENT was strongly impressed with the necessity of establishing the greatest degree of harmony between the United States and the Indians, by encouraging and protecting a trade with them, and that this could be easiest and best effected by establishing a line of forts along the frontiers, to be garrisoned by the manners and customs of the Indians, whose practice it is to spend most of their time on their hunting grounds, leaving their old men, women, and children, in their towns. They have no regular plan of Government, and can only be attached by influencing some of their chiefs. The system of harassing them by burning and destroying their towns at the time they are employed in hunting, has come recommended to us by experience, and regular troops are the best to be employed in this service. Their present inexperience will soon be done away by a proper mode of discipline, and why may not these troops be soon instructed? Are they not as capable of receiving instructions as militia, and may we not expect more subordination amongst them, than could possibly be established over militia? He concluded by declaring himself against the motion.

[Here the SPEAKER informed the Chair that he had received a Confidential Message from the PRESIDENT. The Committee then rose, and the galleries were closed for some time.]

The House having gone into Committee, the debate was renewed by Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. STEELE.

Mr. STEELE rose after Mr. MADISON, and said he was perfectly in sentiment with that gentleman, in regard to the propriety of inserting an amendment to the motion, which might secure a sufficient appropriation to carry on offensive operations against the hostile Indians, by the militia of the frontiers; and if an alteration was proposed to that effect, he would second it. The attention of the House to this question, speaks its importance; it is probable one more important will not occur during the present session. On its decision are suspended the hopes and fears of the people of this country, their hopes of a speedy and honorable peace, and their fears of a standing army, with its usual retinue of political evils.

The present is regarded as an interesting epoch in the affairs of the United States; and it has been perceived, with serious regret, that while our national character is forming, (he hoped it was not yet formed,) it seems to partake, in some respects, more of the unnatural spirit of Monarchy, than of the mild and conciliatory temper of a Republic. The principle of keeping up standing armies, though highly obnoxious to the great body of the people, has not been equally so to the Government; they have been maintained and increased without affording protection, or even defence to the frontiers. The supplies necessary to support the establishment begin to discover an alarming derangement of the public finances, and it is now incumbent on the House of Representatives to check this growing mischief.

Mr. S. then adverted to the effects of standing armies on the morals and political sentiments of the people, wherever they had been employed; of the expensiveness of all such establishments, and of the wicked purposes to which they had been, and might be, subservient. He said he had prepared himself to have spoken largely to this point, and to have quoted the pernicious effects of such a policy in other nations; but the debate having been already lengthy, and the Committee probably fatigued, it would be sufficient for his present purpose, for the members to make their own reflections, for to mark the rapid progression of the Army from 1789 to 1792, both in numbers and expenses. Instances from foreign history are superfluous, when our own affords such ample testimony. The establishment began with one regiment: it is now five. The House was called on 1789 to appropriate a little more than $100,000 for that Department; in the present year, above

$1,000,000 is demanded. The reason of this extraordinary additional expenditure, this unexpected increase of the Army, if not enveloped in darkness, has been founded on policy hitherto not satisfactorily explained. He said, however lightly he was disposed to touch this part of the subject, he could not avoid reminding the Committee of the memorable sentiments of 1776, in regard to standing armies; of the universal abhorrence of the Americans to them at that time; and, to illustrate it more clearly, he read the expressions of some of the States in their Bills of Right. These were the sentiments of the Whigs of 1776, and to such Whigs he wished to appeal on this occasion. He also reminded the Committee of the recent debates of 1788, of the amendments proposed in several of the State Conventions, of the unanimity which prevailed among all ranks of people on this particular point; and it is now to be lamented, said he, that while the ink which recorded these objections to the Constitution is yet drying, the evil then predicted has taken place.

If there is a subject on which much deliberation is unnecessary, in order to form a right opinion, it would be in regard to military establishments. The feelings of a free people revolt at their continuance, and every man who reads or thinks, can point out their dangers. He said he felt more anxiety for the fate of this motion, than commonly marks his conduct, because this is the last session that will ever afford him an opportunity to trouble the House with his sentiments on this or any other subject. The motion was brought forward to discharge a duty which he owed to his constituents, to satisfy his own conscience, and to afford that protection to the frontiers which they deserved, and to save the public money. If an uncommon degree of zeal was discovered in supporting the motion, it ought to be attributed to these, and no other motives.

The question will now soon be taken; if adopted, I shall be among those who rejoice; if rejected, among those who have always submitted with a proper degree of decency to the decision of the majority. But in any event, the public will know that we have asserted the sense of the people against standing armies, that we are anxious to defend the frontiers against their enemies; that we have recommended a system of economy and efficiency, instead of profusion and delay; that we have recommended a system calculated to produce victory and peace, instead of disgrace and war, and that we wish to rescue the Government from the intoxication of the times, and all the apathy of military establishments.

He said he had been attentive to the arguments of the opposition, and they led principally to four points. If neither of these positions be found tenable, the motion will certainly succeed; and that they are not tenable, is believed and will be shown. 1st. It has been boldly asserted that the PRESIDENT is the author of the existing system.

2dly. They call in question the sincerity of our declarations in wishing to afford effectual protection to the frontiers.

3dly. They deny the competency of the militia.

4thly. The impolicy of reducing the establishment, when a treaty is expected. In regard to the first, we deny that the PRESIDENT is the author of this plan of prosecuting the war, not having avowed explicitly himself that he is so, no document appearing to confirm that opinion, we are justified in attributing a system which appears to us ineffectual to his Secretary and not to him.

It is true, that the Secretary is only a finger of his hand and the intimate connexion which must of necessity subsist between them, perhaps is the ground upon which the assertion has been made. The Secretaries are all equally near to the PRESIDENT, and if it be admitted that he is the author of this, he may with equal propriety, be said to have been the author of every system on general subjects which either of them have recommended. Was he the author of the report on the fisheries? Was he the author of the plan for establishing the National Bank? It is known that he was not, and circumstances might be mentioned (which are withheld from delicacy) to confirm this opinion.

Was he the author of the Funding System? Some gentlemen in the opposition to this motion, would not be willing to give the PRESIDENT that credit if he claimed it, and some who support this motion would not only be sorry that the PRESIDENT had even claimed such a credit, but believe that it was in no respect attributable to him. The same gentleman, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] who first asserted that the PRESIDENT was the author of this military plan, in the same speech admitted it to be the War, as well as the plan of the House, and then argued on the necessity of stability in our measures. It is not very material to the present question whose plan it is, being a public measure, we are justified in offering our objections to it, and this is the first time that I have heard it publicly asserted that a Government should persevere in an error, because they had undertaken it. If the plan be a good one, it may be supported by reason; if a bad one, no name ought to be called in to prop it up.

The inconsistency of that gentleman's [Mr. WADSWORTH's] arguments not only supports the motion before the Committee, but shows the wretched shifts which have been used to defeat it. It has been said, in the course of the debate, that individual members, and even this House, are incompetent to decide upon the efficacy or inefficacy of military plans. In answer to this it may be said, that if we are not all Generals, we are all members, and that we have the privilege of thinking for ourselves and for our constituents. To admit this doctrine in the latitude which has been expressed, would be to introduce military ideas indeed; it would be to make soldiers of us, instead of Legislators: nay, worse than that, it would be to revive the exploded doctrines of passive obedience, and non-resistance.

In regard to the sincerity of his intentions to afford effectual protection to the frontiers, Mr. S. said that he had been sufficiently explicit, that a feeling for the sufferers had dictated this motion; that he was sorry that it had been whispered in the ears of some of the members that it was intended to withhold the necessary appropriations, and divert them to other purposes.

If two regiments were insufficient to garrison all the posts necessary for defence, he would, even, under certain restrictions, consent to continue the three sub-legions, thereby enabling the President to establish double the number of posts now erected if he should deem it advisable. Regular troops being incapable of active expeditions against Indians in the wilderness, his wish was to abandon that system and confine them entirely to the garrison.

The next objection to the motion is the incompetency of the militia, and to support this opinion the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Wadsworth] has made this expression, "that as to the expedition under General St. Clair, the regulars were few, and not to be named when compared with the number of the militia." The truth is, there was not a man engaged that day as a militia man, except the advance guard commanded by Colonel Oldham, which consisted of about three hundred, perhaps a few more, the field return of the day preceding the action being in the War Office, this can be ascertained with precision. The balance of the army on that unfortunate day, had been enlisted as regulars, and poor fellows, died even clothed as regulars, and poor fellows, died like regulars. They suffered the fate which awaits every regular army destined for similar expeditions. Even the handful of militia employed that day, did not deserve that name; they were chiefly substitutes for draughted men from the ceded territory. This draught became unavoidable, from a misfortune to General Sevier, which Mr. STEELE related.

The attack on Major Adair has also been mentioned, as a proof of the incompetency of militia, and Mr. S. insisted that the only inference which could be drawn from thence was, that one hundred militia were able to repel, but not destroy near two hundred Indians. This event he conceived was in favor of and not against his motion.

He next adverted to the arguments of Mr. Wadsworth, in regard to the war of 1762; of the establishment of posts in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and of the success of Colonel Boquet's expedition. If two worn out regiments at that time were sufficient to defend the frontiers, and, with the aid of the militia, to terminate the war, two new regiments, with all the vigor which the gentleman described them to possess, with the aid of established posts, and a much more effective militia, can certainly be equal to the same end. After examining Mr. W.'s arguments for some time, Mr. S. said, that when analyzed, it would be found that they proved more than they were intended to prove; but the merits of this motion did not require that he should take advantage of these indiscretions.

He showed from the history of 1762 that though posts were established, with a handful of regular troops in each, they never answered the purpose of effectual protection; but the frontier people were always obliged, in a great degree, to defend themselves; that they were best calculated for that service, and that they would perform it now with alacrity and success, if well rewarded.

Mr. S. then refuted the objection against the militia on account of their waste and expense which Mr. W. had alluded to. The law allows a mounted volunteer, furnishing himself with a good horse, good arms, provisions, and every other necessary, except ammunition, at his own risk and expense, one dollar per day. The exact expense, of such an expedition can be calculated. Whether successful or not, the charge to the public cannot be increased. The contractors, quarter-masters, and hospital departments, are all avoided, with the abuses, expenses, and frauds, attending such establishments. Mr. S. enlarged upon this point, and said that these were always found to be the most expensive departments in any army, and that the Federal Treasury had felt their effects already. In favor of the militia, it may be asked, who fought the battle of Bunker's Hill? Who fought the battle of New Jersey? Who have fought the Indians so often with success, under Generals Wilkinson, Scott, Sevier, and others? Who marched in 1776 under General Rutherford, through the Cherokee nation, laid waste their country, and forced them to peace? Who fought the battles of Georgia, under Clark and Twigg? Who fought the battles of South Carolina, under the command of an honorable member now present? Delicacy forbids me to enlarge upon his successes in his presence.

Who fought the ever-memorable battles of Cowpens, King's Mountain, Hanging Rock, Blackstocks, the pivots on which the Revolution turned in the Southern States? In short, who fought all the battles of the Southern States, while we had a mere handful of regular troops, scarcely the shadow, much less the reality of an army?

They were all fought by freemen, the substantial freeholders of the country; the men attached to the Revolution from principle: men who were sensible of their rights and fought for them.

Such men will not enlist in regular armies, nor will any one who has the disposition or the constitution of a freeman. It would give me pain to describe the trash which composes all regular armies: they enlist for three dollars a month; which, in a country like the United States, is a sufficient description of their bodies as well as their minds. Such men are not fit to combat the most active enemy in the world. Here Mr. S. read Major Gaither's and Major Trueman's depositions, respecting the defeat of the 4th November, 1791, stating that they could not see the Indians, because they were behind trees, &c.; that the regular troops tried, but could not fight that way; that they seemed to be stupid, and incapable of resistance; and that if any General in the world had commanded such men that day, he must have been defeated as they were.

An additional argument, and one of the most weighty, too, against regular expeditions, in this species of warfare, is, that, by the slowness of their movements, the force of the enemy may be concentrated; time is afforded them to form alliances, and to confederate against those whom they consider a common enemy. It is otherwise with militia incursions. He offered a number of reasons to show that it was so, and how essential for the interest of the United States to adopt a policy calculated to detach the tribes from each other as much as possible.

But it has been said, these men were not regular troops. Mr. S. asked, what, then, were they? They surely were not militia. The last objection, and the least serious of all, to this motion, is the expectations of a treaty in the Spring. Mr. S. said, if he thought the gentleman who threw this difficulty in the way believed himself that we have any reason to expect a permanent peace from the treaty now proposed, it may deserve an answer. Facts are more to be relied upon than words. From the channel through which these propositions have come—from the whole complexion of their talks, and from the late attack on Major Adair, it may safely be asserted that no peace can be effected in the Spring. He recapitulated some of the difficulties which this motion had to conflict with, and said that he could mention others, if he was at liberty to do so. Under such circumstances, success is hardly to be expected; but he knew the merits of the motion deserved it.

Mr. HULLHOUSE, who had hitherto sat silent, observed that nothing new had been advanced, in the whole course of this long debate, but what he had heard mentioned last Winter in that House. He was then opposed in principle to a war establishment, and he still retained the same opinion; but, from the complexion of affairs, it appeared to him that he ought to submit, and give up his own opinion to the general sense of the Legislature, which at present seemed to be for persevering in the system already adopted, and which, as it had scarcely had time for a fair trial, he thought, therefore, ought not to be arrested, perhaps in the very instant when its efficacy was to be expected. If peace should not be established during the next Summer, he would then join with such members as would propose a better system; but as the law provides for the discretionary powers of the Executive, it would be best to rely on them. A standing army, he said, was a thing impossible to be accomplished in the United States whilst the House of Representatives have the power of granting money only for two years at any time; he therefore had no fears on that score. An army existing in time of peace was the idea he had of a standing army, and not an army embodied for only a year or two. Upon the whole, it would be as expensive to disband the present force, and to institute another of militia, &c., as it will be to keep up the existing establishment for a little longer time; it was therefore his advice to let the matter rest where it is, with the Executive, for the present. But, in case of a peace not being accomplished within a reasonable period, he would join those who would be for a change in the system; and he was clearly of opinion that a system might easily be adopted, not only to protect our frontiers by repelling the savages, but to exterminate them altogether.

Mr. FINDLEY felt himself inclined to say a word or two more in reply to Mr. STEELE. He thought it would be unjust to lay so much of the weight of protecting the frontiers on the militia only. He expatiated on the meaning of the word militia as defined by law, &c. He also remarked that, however it might be fashionable to despise the levies, yet amongst them there were examples of great bravery to be found, and particularly in one battalion of the unfortunate army on the 4th of November, 1791. He noticed the well-conducted retreat of Major CLARK, and the success of General Brodhead up the Alleghany. It was unjust to expect to raise enough of militia in the back parts of Pennsylvania; and the inhabitants of Virginia are so dispersed near the frontiers that they cannot be expected from that State. With respect to the men who went out with General Harmar, and whose time of enlistment expired soon after they reached the scene of operations, many of them remained and settled in that country. He again repeated the injustice of calling out heads of families from one part of the frontier; and, above all, he lamented the risk and loss of lives. But, if it should be determined to carry on the war with militia, let them be called from all parts of the United States. The burden already laid on a part of the inhabitants is extremely unequal, and must not lay longer on them. Let the troops now raising be disciplined. I am informed that many of them are considerably advanced in point of discipline, and may before Spring become expert soldiers. Let these go on in the present system, and let the militia also be kept up or increased, until the object shall be attained for which the law was intended, and then, and not before, it may be proper to talk of reducing the present establishment. We are now in a situation that it would be extremely imprudent to retreat from.

Mr. MURRAY delivered some opinions on the preceding arguments of all the members, and remarked that the army, under the present establishment, had no right to be compared to or called a standing army; it bore no more comparison to a standing army than a camelion to an owl.

Mr. WADSWORTH closed this tedious debate with a few further explanations. He accounted for the difference between his calculations and those of the gentleman from North Carolina by observing that he got some of his statements from the War Office. Mr. STEELE's were taken from the appropriation laws, and in one instance he had underrated the appropriations. With regard to the opinions he had delivered on the militia, he had never meant to traduce the character of militia, because he had often experienced their brilliant actions; his arguments went no further than to show that the operations of regular troops were in general more effectual. He never wished to detract from the honor of militia, but only to remark that they were not so efficient as regular troops.

The question on the original motion being now put, was negatived.

Mr. WILLIAMSON did not entirely approve of the motion in its present form; the blanks might be so filled, he thought, as to import a thing opposite to his wishes—they might import a discharge of the regular troops already raised. He believed his colleague had no such desire; he thought the measure would be improper; but he wished not to have a regiment of officers without soldiers; he wished to fix a time at which the recruiting service should cease and the supernumerary officers should be discharged. As he intended to move that the proposition might be so amended, he should consider it in that light, and he believed the measure would not be imprudent nor inconsistent with the most vigorous measures of defence or offence.

It should be remembered that the House of Representatives, when they had the bill before them, which last Winter passed into a law, for defending the frontiers, sent it to the Senate, with a clause importing that officers below the rank of field-officers should not be put into commission any faster than troops could be enlisted. The Senate, adhering to their privilege, refused to agree to that clause in the bill, and it became necessary immediately to commission the officers for five thousand men, some of whom, if report speaks truth, not covetous of honor, are content with their pay, without having raised three men. By the proposed amendment the officers only would be dismissed, whom most of us wished never to have seen in commission.

The proposed regulation has been censured as implicating some kind of censure on the Executive. He viewed it in a different light. The Executive had done what was proper and necessary at the time. But if it should appear that other measures would fit the change of circumstances, he did not see why those measures should not be adopted. It should be recollected that, during the last Winter, when the estimate of five thousand men as necessary for the defence of our frontier was handed to Congress, there was no Militia law. A well-armed effective militia, that Palladium of Liberty, had once and again been recommended by the President to the attention of Congress; but Congress, from year to year, as if they wished for a standing army, had neglected the militia. Towards the close of the last session, indeed, they passed a law. He hoped he might, without offence, call it the shadow of a law. It was saying, in a few words, that the several States might have a good militia, if they pleased; and, if they pleased, they might have none at all. Was the Executive to trust the defence of a country to a militia formed under such a law? He thought not. But he observed that, since the last Winter, it had come to be generally known that a class of our fellow-citizens exist in the frontiers who are at all times ready to serve, not as drafted militia, but as volunteers. These are the men by whom the Indians must be chastized, or we shall never have peace. They are the best woodsmen and marksmen, and they have no professional interest in spinning out the war. He must repeat the observation that volunteers of the militia are the only troops for vigorous offensive operations. Figure to yourselves an army of regulars creeping through the wilderness, with all its cannon and other military apparatus, in chase of a naked savage, who sees it without being seen. It is an elephant in chase of a wolf. The troops already raised may be pretty well disciplined before the season for action; they are sufficient, with the co-operation of the militia, to take a post, and build forts where they please; everything else is beyond their power, if they were not five but fifteen thousand. They will never see an Indian unless he chooses to be seen. He wished to be indulged in a single observation respecting a case in which it was said, the other day, that militia had been surprised. He was sorry that his naming Major Adair had produced the remark. He would nevertheless venture to repeat the case as an instance of vigilance and bravery. The Major, believing there was an enemy at hand, had visited all his posts at midnight in person; his Lieutenant, Madison, before the dawn of day, roused all the men, telling them that the Indians were coming. The Major, wishing to leave the ground before daylight, called in the sentinels; but the Indians, rushing in with them, gave a heavy fire before there was light by which they could be seen. The Major had not the merit, as he believed, of having been a Continental officer, but he had the merit, not less honorable, of having served bravely in the militia. He questioned whether any of the green troops to be recruited next Spring or Summer will make so good a defence as Major Adair's militia had made. They had taken scalp for scalp, though they fought against the odds of three to one. He prayed it might be remembered that his ideas were not founded on any hopes of sudden peace with the Indians; on the contrary, every motion of the Indians, and every measure taken by those who had most influence over the Indians, induced him to regard an Indian war as the perpetual tax of at least one million per annum. It is fortunate, as he conceived, that the United States know the source of their misfortunes; and if they are compelled to spend one million per annum in opposing a savage enemy, who seems to be hunted upon them, perhaps they may be taught to indemnify themselves by refusing to expend several millions which they can easily save. If a perpetual tax on this head must be raised, sound policy will readily point to the proper object of taxation; but this must remain over for our successors. In the mean time, believing that the troops already raised are sufficient to maintain every fort that is or may be erected, and being confident that volunteers may be found at any time sufficient, if it shall be necessary to extirpate every hostile tribe of Indians, he should vote for the proposition with the proposed amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. W.'s amendment, viz:—
“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States to — regiments, to consist of the men who are now in service, or who may be recruited before the — day of — next,” &c.— was negatived—32 to 24. The question then was on the original resolution, as moved by Mr. STEELE; which, being put, it was negatived—21 members only rising in favor of it. The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported accordingly. The report was laid on the table, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 7.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to repeal part of a resolution of Congress of the 29th of August, 1788, respecting the inhabitants of Post Saint Vincents; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee to whom was re-committed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee, and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table. The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

TUESDAY, January 8.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793, which lay on the table; and the said bill being amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled “An act in addition to the act entitled ‘An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States;’ to which they desire the concurrence of this House.”

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying a report of the assays and experiments made by the Director of the Mint, on the gold and silver coins of France, England, Spain, and Portugal, pursuant to the order of the 29th of November last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled “An act in addition to the act entitled ‘An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,’ was read twice, and committed.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of the 28th ultimo, for reducing the Military Establishment of the United States, to which the Committee of the Whole House had reported their disagreement on Saturday last. Whereupon,

A motion was made and seconded to amend the same by striking out the words “each of — non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians,” and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words “of — non-commissioned officers, musicians, and — of the privates who are now in service, or may be recruited before the — day of — next.”

And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 26, nays 32, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kitters, John Laurance, John Milledge, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, and Francis Willis.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said motion, it passed in the negative—yeas 20, nays 36, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kitters, John Laurance, Richard Bland Lee, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was committed the Letter and Representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, referred to in the President's Message of the 7th of November last, be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and partly considered.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said amendments be put off until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793, was read the third time, and passed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions. Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded further to amend the same by adding to the end thereof the following section, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That no person, not on the pension list before the twenty-third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be entitled to a pension, who shall not have complied with the rules and regulations herein prescribed, saving, however, to all persons all and singular their rights, founded upon legal adjudications, under the act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions'; but it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, to take such measures as may be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States on the validity of any such rights, claimed under the act aforesaid, by the determination of certain persons, availing themselves of the provisions of the act."

And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 40, nays 20, as follows:

And then the said bill being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States,' so far as respects the coinage of copper," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

THURSDAY, January 10.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

An engrossed bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions was read the third time, and a blank therein filled up.

And on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 36, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Elias Boudinot, Abraham Clark, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, William B. Giles, Nicholas Gilman, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Alexander D. NAYS.—Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Goodhue, James Hillhouse, John Laurence, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Israel Smith, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, and Artemas Ward.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill relative to claims against the United States not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 12th ultimo, for opening a Loan to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States.

After reading the report of the Commissioners for settling the accounts, Mr. Giles made some opposition to providing for these balances before they were ascertained; that is not done by the report of the Commissioners.

Mr. FITZSIMONS briefly stated the motives which had induced him to come forward with the resolutions previous to ascertaining the balances; he thought that, while there was an uncertainty in the matter, the decisions would be more readily and impartially made.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to providing for balances before they were known; he thought the resolutions incomplete, as they recognised only creditor States, and say nothing about debtor States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he did not believe there would be any debtor States; he was sure there ought not to be any.

Mr. MANISON objected to the resolutions on the same principle with Mr. LIVERMORE; he enlarged on the idea, and insisted that, without the most urgent necessity, the provision contemplated ought not to be made in the present uncertain state of the subject. On the principles of justice and economy, he contended that a system which would be so complex in its operation ought not to be adopted; it would operate to the extension of taxation in the United States to the greatest degree, as it would involve a further levying of taxes to reimburse the States that shall finally appear to have large balances due them.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he was not understood. Adverting to the act for assuming the State debts, he observed that these balances were there recognised, and the creditors to whom these balances are due are to all intents and purposes creditors of the Union. Mr. FITZSIMONS said he had no idea of the result contemplated by the gentleman in respect to the extension of taxes. No possible difference, he conceived, could take place whether the balances were now assumed, or the ascertainment of them was made previous thereto; the operation would be precisely the same in both cases.

Mr. SEDGWICK replied to Mr. MANISON. He stated various reasons to show that his objection on the score of increased taxes had really no foundation. Mr. SEDGWICK entered into a short discussion of the subject, and stated the real situation of some of the States, to whose citizens large sums are due. He said he had no doubt the General Government would consider themselves bound to pay those demands; could he despair of the public faith in this respect, he should anticipate the most pernicious consequences to flow from the withholding that justice, which those States now looked to the General Government to obtain.

Mr. MERCER observed, that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania had brought forward his proposition in such a shape, as that it was difficult to determine what his object was; but he inferred from his explanations, unless he contradicted himself, that the real object was a further assumption of the State debts, and to effect the adoption of a question which was rejected the last session.

Here Mr. M. entered into a consideration of the various principles which had been proposed as bases for settling and adjusting the accounts between the United States and individual States. He contended that the matter was not in such a state as to justify adopting the principle of the resolution. He adverted to the approaching dissolution of the present Congress. He remarked on the difference of the exertions which had been made by the several States; he inferred that there must necessarily be both debtor and creditor States, and hence deduced various considerations which should influence a postponement of this subject.

Mr. GERRY recurred to the Funding Act, to show that debtor and creditor States were therein recognised; with respect to the principles on which the accounts are to be settled, that matter rests with the Commissioners, whose decision by a law of the Government is to be final; but this he conceived had nothing to do with the present proposition. He noticed several other objections offered by Mr. MERCER, which he thought appeared to be brought forward merely to embarrass the subject. He observed that the present proposition was totally different from that agitated last session; that now offered is reasonable; is founded on equal principles; and its effect will not be to increase the creditors of the Union, nor induce a necessity for one farthing of taxation, which will not be wanted after the accounts are adjusted and the balances known. He hoped, therefore, that the proposition would be agreed to.

Mr. B. BOURNE supported the resolution, as being free from the objections urged to those offered the last session. He noticed the remarks which had been made on the resources in lands of the States to whom the balances are supposed to be due; Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and South Carolina are the States the most interested in the matter; those States have no lands. With respect to exertions in the common cause, it will not be pretended that those States have not made as great an exertion as any in the Union. The present proposition involves this simple inquiry, whether the United States shall pay the States as States, or whether they will pay the individual creditors? Justice required, in his opinion, that the latter ought to be paid; for their demands are recognised by a law of the Union, and they are, to all intents and purposes, creditors of the Union as fully as any description of creditors whatever.

Mr. CLARK said, when the resolutions were first proposed, he thought no objection would be made to them; but he had heard something which had alarmed him, and that was what fell from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there would be no debtor States; this, he said, alarmed him, as it appeared to convey an idea of the Commissioners for settling the accounts having adopted the principle; this he conceived they were not authorized to do. He further observed, that he did not think with those who supposed that the decisions of the Commissioners were not to be revised; he was pretty sure they would be revised, if they adopted any such principle as this, which he considered as involving great injustice.

Mr. FITZSIMONS rose to explain; he said he was misunderstood; he had not said there would be no debtor States. Different principles of settling the accounts have been mentioned, but he had not said whether the Commissioners would settle the accounts on the principle of debtor and creditor States, or make them all debtor or all creditor States. He had only given his opinion that there ought to be no debtor States. The question now before the Committee is, whether the United States shall pay the States in their corporate capacities, or pay the individual creditors. He conceived the gentleman was totally mistaken in his opinion respecting a revision of the judgment of the Commissioners; the law, he said, had put that entirely out of the power of the Legislature.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that he conceived the present proposition had nothing to do with the question respecting debtor or creditor States; it relates simply to a provision for the sums due to the individual creditors of the several States, who are really creditors of the United States. He noticed the objection from additional taxes; no difference, he contended, would result from the measure, the balances are to be provided for at all events. That the present was the best time to take up the subject, he observed, was well argued by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; in addition to which, he thought the allusion to the state of affairs on the Representation bill, by the gentleman from Maryland, was directly in point; the difficulties on account of the ratio were increased, when the result of the census was known; and this would be the case if this matter should be postponed to the time when the accounts are settled. He therefore contended that the present was the most proper time to make the provision contemplated. Mr. SMITH noticed, in order, the various objections which had been made by several gentlemen, and concluded that he trusted, from what he had said, it would appear that the proposition was entirely clear of those difficulties which had been urged against it.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved an amendment to the first resolution; the object of which was to exonerate those States who on a final adjustment of accounts shall appear to be debtor States.

Mr. GERRY offered some objections to this amendment.

Mr. AMES said that the amendment appeared to him irrelevant to the subject now under consideration; he hoped, therefore, the gentleman would be induced to withdraw it.

Mr. MANISON observed, that when the amendment was first brought forward he had supposed it merely sportive, but it now appears that the gentleman is serious in moving it. He thought it in this view a proposition that might well excite attention; for he conceived it an extraordinary idea to be advanced, that any of the States who should be found debtor States should be released from all obligations to pay.

Mr. SENGWICK offered various observations on the subject generally; the tenor of which was this, that however it might appear on the final adjustment of accounts, that there were sundry debtor States, yet it was hardly practicable to devise a mode of compelling payment from such States; nor could he collect it to be the opinion of any gentleman that an idea of compulsion was entertained by any one.

Mr. LIVERMORE said his motion was not understood; he had no idea of exonerating the debtor States in the manner suggested by several of the gentlemen who had remarked on it; by the explanation he gave of his motion, it appeared that his object was the apportioning the general charge, and to exonerate the debtor States from any demand against them, on account of the credit they were entitled to as members of the Union, not to release them from their full proportion of the average charge of prosecuting the war.

Mr. MERCER said he was more and more convinced that there was to be no debtor States; the proposition from the gentleman from New Hampshire says so; the resolutions originally moved speak the same language; the report of the Secretary of the Treasury is founded on the same principle. The meaning of all which is, burn the books.

Mr. CLARK moved that the Commissioners for settling the accounts should be instructed to report a statement of all the debts and credits of the several States. He reprobated the idea of making all creditor States, as he conceived the consequence would be a great increase of the balances to be provided for by the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMSON observed that he could not agree to the propositions, for reasons which he would give. In the law for settling the accounts of the several States, it is provided that the States who shall have balances placed to their credit on the books of the Treasury shall, within twelve months after the same, be entitled to have them funded. Such are the words of the law; but we are now requested to do the thing by anticipation which, according to the law, was to be done afterwards. Is there any consistency—is there any principle in such conduct? Whence this haste, this speed of funding? Have gentlemen such a pleasure in building up the ponderous structure of a national debt that no part of the work can remain for their successors? He hoped that a Representative from North Carolina might be allowed to complain of this unnecessary, unkind, he prayed it might not be fatal speed. North Carolina, at present, is not fairly represented. It is known that, instead of five members, she will have ten in the next Congress. The States in general are to have no such increase. Is it fair to anticipate measures contrary to the intent and promise of your law, as if you wished to tax our citizens before they can be properly represented? It is well known that much offence has been given to many good citizens by the Funding Act. It has been charged to motives which are very improper, considering the regard which is due to public opinion. He thought they were bound in honor to postpone rather than to anticipate the assumption of more paper. If gentlemen, however, could not trust this delectable business in the hands of a future Congress; if they could not trust their own States with the payment of a small debt; if they wished to render the National Government still more unpopular by giving it exclusively the iron hand of taxation, he hoped they would not make themselves accessories to the most abandoned junctio that ever disgraced society. If the propositions before the Committee should pass into a law, the State of North Carolina would be charged with something more than half a million of dollars, interest included, for certificates that were confessedly issued by the force of bribery and corruption. They were not founded on the shadow of service, and are prohibited by the laws of the State. The most sleepy sot in life would resent such conduct. They would suspect that such paper must have had some undue influence. He was confident that the propositions imported more than had been intended.

He wished that left-handed favors of this sort could be more equally divided. It was hard that North Carolina should be distinguished by her sufferings. In the settlement of her accounts he thought it was probable that she would lose near two millions of dollars by the manner in which her accounts were to be adjusted. He supposed that a rule by which a good horse put into the service does not bring the State more than half a dollar could not be a good rule. This must be a loss, first, to the citizens, afterwards to the State, which is nearly the same thing. There is another sum of about a million of dollars, which the citizens of that State seem to be in a fair way of losing by the measures of Government. They have received nothing for their certificates, and they are not permitted to fund them. Oblige the citizens of North Carolina after all those losses or oppressions, to pay half a million that they do not owe, and you will at least deserve the title of hardy politicians. He said that he should offer no amendments to the propositions, because, in his opinion, they were improper in every part. The question was then adjourned till the next day.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report of a supplementary statement of loans, made in behalf of the United States, pursuant to the resolution of the 27th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be directed to report, at the next session of Congress, a table of costs and fees for the Courts of the United States.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 12th ultimo, for opening a Loan, to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said motion under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the motion, made on the 12th ultimo, for opening a Loan to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States, which was reported from the Committee of the Whole House, yesterday, without amendment. Whereupon, a motion being made and seconded to amend the first resolution, contained in the said motion, by adding, to the end thereof, the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, That no such loan shall be opened in any State, without the assent of the Legislature thereof, by an act approving the measure."

2d CON.—27

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 38, nays 23, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Giles, Nicholas Gilman, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Daniel Heister, Richard Bland Lee, Nathaniel Macon, John Francis Mercer, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, William Vans Murray, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, John Steele, Thomas Tredwell, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said first resolution, amended to read as follows:

"Resolved, That a loan, to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States, be opened at the Loan Office in the respective States, to commence within — months after the said balances shall be reported at the Treasury, and to continue open for the term of — months from the time of its commencement: Provided, That no such loan shall be opened in any State without the assent of the Legislature thereof, by an act approving the measure."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Hugger, Philip Key, John Wilkes Kitters, John Laurence, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Alexander White.

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. of the certificates or notes issued by any of the said States, as, upon the final settlement of accounts, shall have a balance due to them from the United States, and which shall have been liquidated to specie value, prior to the — day of — last.

Resolved, That every subscriber to the said loans shall be entitled to certificates, according to the sum subscribed, of the like tenor and description, in the like proportions, and upon the like terms, as are specified and directed by the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the Debt of the United States,' except that interest on such of the certificates subscribed to the said loan, as bear interest, shall be computed to the last day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, inclusively, and that interest shall not begin to accrue upon any of the certificates which shall be issued in lieu thereof, till the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

Resolved, That in all cases where the sum subscribed in the evidences of the debt of any State, shall exceed the balance due to such State, the same shall be reduced (in equal proportions) to the sum actually due to such State.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. FITZSIMMONS, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, January 14.

A memorial of the officers of the late Delaware line of the Continental Army, in behalf of themselves and the soldiers of the said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debts granted them for military services rendered during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom are referred the memorials of the late officers and soldiers of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment reported on Thursday last, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted; and the said amendment being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported, on the 27th ultimo, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and the same being read, were agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

PAY OF THE LATE ARMY.

Mr. Boudinot moved for the order of the day on the Bankrupt law. The importance of this subject to the general interest, and that of a number of individuals in several of the States, who, by reason of the State Governments being precluded from passing bankrupt laws, are in a very distressed situation, was urged by several of the members. It was further observed, that it had long been before Congress; and if it was not taken up at the present session, it was very problematical whether it would be completed at the next session.

In opposition to the motion, it was observed, that though the subject has been a long time on the carpet, yet it had not been reduced to any specific form till very lately. That the bill had been laid before the public for the express purpose of collecting the general sense of the people on the subject. Sufficient time has not elapsed for this purpose, and therefore it was not possible for the Legislature to proceed in the matter, aided by the general sense of their constituents relative thereto.

The motion was at length withdrawn; and, on motion of Mr. GERRY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DAYTON in the Chair,) and took into consideration the memorials of the officers of the several lines of the late Army, on the subject of a deficiency of their pay. The several memorials were, from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland lines. The New Hampshire and Pennsylvania memorials being read—

Mr. GERRY said, in order to bring the subject before the Committee, he should move the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the contract between Congress and part of the officers and soldiers of the armies raised for the establishment of the Independence of the United States, has not been fulfilled on the part of Congress.

This motion was seconded by Mr. PARKER.

Mr. GERRY accompanied his motion by several observations, in which he showed that a depreciated medium could never be considered as an equivalent for services and supplies which were contracted to be paid for in specie.

Several members objected to the indefiniteness of this resolution. They suggested the propriety of the mover's bringing forward a sketch of the plan for which he intended the resolution as a basis.

Mr. MADISON suggested a variation of the proposition, to the simple question on the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitions.

After several observations from other members, and the Chairman had remarked that the resolution of Mr. GERRY was not in order, as referring to a part of the officers, whereas the memorials made no distinction.

Mr. CLARK moved in order to take the sense of the Committee, the following:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the prayer of the petitions of officers of several lines of the late American army cannot be granted, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions."

Mr. SEDGWICK observed, that he did not rise to express an opinion as to any vote which he might ultimately give on the subject now before the Committee. It was undoubtedly an important subject; important, as it respects the character of the applicants, and as it involved a consideration of the services which had been rendered by them. No man had a more respectful opinion than he entertained of the honorable patriotism of those brave and meritorious citizens who had ventured their lives in defence of their country. No man would more regret than himself, that those services should remain unremunerated. Thus feeling, he should be sorry if the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey should preclude a discussion of the various questions which might otherwise arise in the contemplation of this subject.

He said he knew several gentlemen who believed that it was impracticable to grant the prayer of the memorials, without producing evils, so many and so great, as infinitely more than to counterbalance the benefits intended. That it would be a criminal reflection on gentlemen who, with so much warmth of declaration, had espoused the cause of the applicants, to suppose that they foresaw those evils and were not prepared to guard against them. It would be indirectly charging upon them as the motive of their conduct, to give an approving countenance to an impracticable object, an intention of acquiring popularity at the expense of the reputation of the Government. This was a charge he had no disposition to make; he would therefore suppose the gentlemen had digested some scheme, in their opinion, of practicable compensation, which, by what they have said, they have pledged to bring forward to the consideration of the Committee; but they would be precluded from doing it, should the mover of the present question persist in having the fate of the memorials decided on his motion.

He said that, confident in the hope that the gentlemen would gratify the wishes of his friends, he would take the liberty of mentioning some of the embarrassing questions which the Committee must meet in the progress of this business.

The whole merit of the present application, in his opinion, rested on the supposition that by the terms of the Funding law the Government had made a saving to itself; or, to speak with more precision, to the debtor part of the community. In other words, that by the terms of the loan an adequate provision was not made for the public debt. This supposition is denied by many gentlemen, who did not hesitate expressly to declare that the provision is ample, and ought to be satisfactory. Others, he said, went further, and even insinuated that there existed a sympathetic sensibility between the majority of Congress and the public creditors, injurious to the great body of the people. This saving constituted that residuum of the original contract, which was the subject of the present demand. If, then, there was no saving there was no residuum, no subject of distribution. On this idea the application is to the generosity, not the justice, of Congress. On this ground the memorials, he presumed, were not advocated by those gentlemen. Should it, however, be demonstrated that the contemplated saving had been made to the public, he asked whether this was the only description of creditors to whom injustice had been done? And would not the same arguments which should demonstrate their rights prove equally the title of every other original holder to further provision? Was there any discriminating principle by which it would appear that these men alone were entitled to redress for a violation of justice? These questions were important, and being obvious, they must have occurred to the gentlemen, who, it might reasonably be presumed, had come prepared, if not with satisfactory, at least with plausible answers.

He said, that among the evils which had been endured during our struggle for freedom and independence, was a lapse of public credit, by which there had been apportioned a severe tax on the citizens; and although this was not in exact proportion, yet it was generally more equal than probably any reapportionment would make it. It was said, at least by some, that by comparing the relative circumstances of the army before and since the war, with the community at large, it might be presumed that they had not contributed to this tax beyond their proportion. If, on the whole, the claim of the army could not be distinguished from that of the other original creditors, and if justice required the provision contended for, then it would follow, irresistibly, that an account was to be opened with each original creditor; that even if a distinction could be discovered which would authorize a difference between the army and every other description of creditors, it was, he said, further asked by gentlemen who believed the project to be impracticable, whether it was intended, by a further distinction, to separate the officers from the soldiers, to provide for the former and not for the latter? If one part of the dilemma was chosen, it would operate manifest injustice; if the other, the Government would open those sources of speculation which seemed to threaten to inundate the country with enormous evils. He said gentlemen who were disposed to afford a favorable countenance to the present applications had undoubtedly considered these effects, and had also considered the means of preventing those evils, and candor required that they should be indulged with an opportunity of exhibiting their system.

He said that it was further objected, that the proposed measure would materially alter the Funding system, a strict adherence to which was guaranteed to the public by an almost unanimous vote of both Houses.

He said the objections he had mentioned were among the most important of those which had occurred on this subject; that a discussion of them would open an extensive field of argument. He thought it would be of public utility that they should be discussed; he therefore again solicited the gentlemen from New Jersey to withdraw his motion, that an opportunity might be afforded to gentlemen to bring forward a digested system.

Mr. Boudinot assured the Committee that he had determined not to trouble them on this subject, and he should have carried that determination into execution, did he not find that the question was likely to be taken in a manner not altogether pleasing to him. He had expected that the claims of the officers would have been fairly met, and if decided in the negative, those gentlemen would have gone away fully satisfied that their claims had received a fair and candid discussion. But he feared, from the arguments of gentlemen, that the idea that the United States had unjustly failed in performing the contract with the Army, would take place, and an ungrounded imputation of partiality (at least in the minds of the petitioners) would be left on the Government, when Mr. B. thought a fair statement of the matter would undoubtedly put a very different face on the whole subject. The officers of the Army had come forward as creditors of the United States in a decent and becoming manner, and presented their claims founded on former contracts, which they conceived had not been fulfilled, and therefore they called on Government to do what was right and just on the occasion. Congress were the independent representatives of the whole Union, to whom every citizen ought to have free access; and where every citizen was to be considered as equally entitled to an impartial hearing. If, on examination, it should appear that justice required a further compensation to the petitioners as a class of public creditors, when considered on a general scale, no man in the House would be more ready than himself to give his voice for such a measure. But if it should appear that the contract on the part of the public had been complied with, as far as distributive justice would permit, he wished the petitioners to be convinced of it, and that those losses they had met with, were such as had been equally borne by other creditors of the Union, and therefore a general burden, by which he hoped they would receive full satisfaction on this subject.

Pay of the Late Army.

Mr. B., while he acknowledged the patriotism and virtue of the American Army, and subscribed fully to their eminent services and patient sufferings, he could not join in decrying the essential services and sufferings of the other public creditors of the United States, who, in the day of her distress, had administered their property to the support of that Army and the defence of the Union.

All public creditors who presented themselves in the day of distress to the relief of the Union, were equally entitled to the attention of Congress; but, as the officers in their memorials had applied in behalf of the army alone, he wished to consider their case, in the first instance, abstractedly, without connecting it with any other class of creditors, and then compare it with others of their fellow-citizens.

He undertook, therefore, in the first place, to state the public conduct towards the Army from the beginning to the commencement of the present Government. He would then examine the conduct of the present Government; and lastly, supposing their claim just, inquire into the practicability of satisfying it.

The Committee were well acquainted with the rise and progress of the late war. At the first alarm the patriotic citizens of the Colonies flew to their arms and formed in the field, without terms or stipulations as to their services. In 1775, Congress turned their attention to the Army as the first great object, and having organized it, fixed the pay at the rate of fifty dollars for a Colonel, and twenty dollars for a Captain. In 1776, desirous of encouraging citizens who were so zealous in their country's service, they gave a bounty of twenty dollars to each private, amounting in the whole to upwards of two hundred thousand dollars, besides a promise of one hundred acres of land; and to the officers at the rate of five hundred acres to a Colonel, and the rest in proportion. In October of the same year, desirous of keeping up the zeal of the officers, they increased the pay in the proportion of seventy-five dollars to a Colonel, and forty dollars to a Captain, and gave a suit of clothes per annum to every private, or twenty dollars in cash. In December, 1777, Congress showed their desire of encouraging the service, by giving a month's extra pay to the Army. The officers, anxious for their future support after the war was over, expressed an earnest desire of having some provision of this sort anticipated, and Congress, in compliance with their desires, after a consideration of three months, or more, agreed, in May, 1778, to give each officer half-pay for seven years after the end of the war, on condition that they did not hold any office of profit under any individual State, and eighty dollars to each private. In November following they gave to each supernumerary officer one year's pay extraordinary, and increased the allowance for every retained ration to 2s. 6d. in money. The Army, not being satisfied with this provision, in August, 1779, a committee, appointed for the purpose, reported further provision of half-pay for life, without any condition in favor of those who should continue to the end of the war, and recommended to the States to provide for widows of officers and soldiers who should be killed in the service. Congress likewise increased the allowance of monthly subsistence for officers to five hundred dollars for a Colonel, a Captain two hundred dollars, and a private ten dollars; and, added to all this, Congress allowed the officers to receive from the public stores one hat, a watch-coat, body coat, four vests, four pair of breeches, four shirts, four stocks, six pair of stockings, and four pair of shoes, per annum, nearly at former prices; and the soldiers in proportion. The half-pay for life was adopted, to the great offence of individual States, who sent forward petitions against the measure as impolitic and unjust. The war continuing, the distresses of the country increased, which reduced the public credit so low, as to produce great uneasiness among all classes of public creditors, both in the Army and country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HARR-LETT,] in his argument, represented (in Mr. B.'s opinion) his own feelings on the occasion, rather than a comparative view of the sufferings of the citizens at large; for it is not uncommon, when gentlemen are connected with a particular class of sufferers, to view what he sees and hears as an exclusive and peculiar evil, without considering what passes elsewhere. Thus, the soldier considers the sacrifice of the Army as the only intolerable burden; while the merchant, knowing his own losses best, considers others' complaints as trifling compared to his; and the farmer, who earns every farthing by the sweat of his brow, blames the Government for not giving him the first place in all their systems. Yet the fair conclusion is, that the burden has been generally nearly equal, and a common tax for the defence of our country. And although Mr. B. readily subscribed to the great sufferings and patriotic exertions of the Army, yet they should also give credit for the attention of the country to the utmost of her abilities. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania is best acquainted with the line of his own State, Mr. B. undertook to mention what was done by Pennsylvania for her own officers in addition to the allowance of Congress. During the war, stores were provided, from which they received a partial supply at the hard money prices. The depreciation of their pay was fully made up to them; at the sales of the confiscated estates their certificates were received as hard money; the same for lands in the land office; the interest of six per cent. was paid on their certificates for a number of years; an additional bounty of land was given to them, ready surveyed and free from expense; and when the Funding System took place, they had their three per cent. and deferred debt made good to six per cent. by additional certificates from the State, which were afterwards redeemed at about fifty and thirty-seven per cent. in hard money.

In August, 1782, a memorial from the State of Pennsylvania called loudly on Congress for fresh exertions towards the settlement of all accounts, and making provision for the paying off the public debt. It is supposed the Army took the hint, and in December following, a deputation of field officers, with a strong memorial on behalf of the Army, waited on Congress. The substance of their request was—first, some present pay; secondly, a settlement of their accounts and security for their pay for life; as they found that the measure was odious to their fellow-citizens, and would prevent the happy intercourse they expected on their return to private life. The present pay and settlement of accounts were immediately provided for, and as to security for the balances, Congress resolved, "as to what relates to the providing of security for what shall be found due on such settlement, that the troops of the United States, in common with all the creditors of the same, have an undoubted right to expect such security, and that Congress will make every effort in their power to obtain from the respective States substantial funds adequate to the object," &c. As to the commutation, it was urged, on the part of the Army, that five or six years full pay was but a reasonable sum to make good their sufferings, not only on account of the deficiency of their pay, but also on other accounts; and that it would be more agreeable to their fellow-citizens, than that they should be pensioners for life. Mr. B. mentioned this from his memory, which he said was confirmed by the Journals of Congress of February, 1783, when a resolution proposed was preface in this manner: "Whereas, in consequence of the faithful services of the officers of the Army of the United States, and of their great sufferings, not only on account of the deficiency of their pay, but on other accounts, Congress have, by divers resolutions, promised them half-pay, &c. The want of money having been raised as an objection against this measure, the officers contended that they expected nothing more than certificates for their balances, in the same manner as other creditors of the United States had received. Congress finally determined to grant their request; but to prevent the Army from alienating their certificates at an under rate, and thereby affecting the public credit, it was proposed that they should not be made transferable. As soon as the delegation from the Army were made acquainted with this, they spurned at the idea, and justly asked if they were not free-men; if the balances were not their own property; whether they had not the same right to dispose of their property as they pleased, with every other citizen? They therefore insisted to be put on a footing with every other creditor who had received certificates. The reasoning was too forcible to be answered with propriety; and therefore Congress, on the 22d of March, 1783, resolved, "that such officers, &c., shall be entitled to receive the amount of five years' full pay in money or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum, as Congress shall find most convenient, instead of the half-pay promised for life; the said securities to be such as shall be given to other creditors of the United States, provided it is at the option of the lines of the respective States to accept or refuse the same." That, with regard to the retiring officers, the commutation, if accepted by them, shall be in lieu of whatever may be now due, &c. This commutation amounted to $4,500 to a Colonel, and $2,400 to a Captain.

Mr. B. alleged his privacy to this arrangement, having been in Congress at the time, and of course one of the parties to the contract. He also observed very particularly on this measure originating with the Army, and especially the negotiable property of the certificates: that in this transaction all former demands were involved, and the express stipulation of the Army and the assent of Congress was, not to pay a specific sum in specie, but to give such securities for the balances as should be given to the other creditors of the United States. Here, then, was no difference between creditors; all were put on a footing; and every citizen who had made advances for the Government, or had fought her battles, were considered equally entitled to the attention of Government. From this time the demands of the Army put on the face of a settled debt, and requisitions were made to the different States for a fund on which to found a certainty of payment, at least of the interest, from year to year: all the States but one having made the necessary arrangements, the plan was frustrated; but many of the individual States made provision for, and did actually pay, the interest of six per cent. for several years. Notwithstanding these partial payments the public credit suffered much, and, among other causes, the great number of these negotiable securities brought to market was not the least. The distresses of some, the different objects of pursuit of others which required capital, the debts of others which called for payment as soon as the war was over, and the fears of others for the fate of the Government, all conspired to bring on a general bankruptcy. These securities fell from six shillings and eight pence to two shillings and six pence in the pound, and transfers were as common as any other merchandise. The public fears and the universal complaint of creditors finally brought about a change of the Government, and the new Constitution was formed, in which two material articles applied to all creditors: one, that the new Government was to be liable for the debts of the old; and another, that all contracts should be carried into effect agreeably to the terms of them. The old Congress had so far complied with their engagements as to give the securities required by the contract, and to apply to the individual States for the funds promised. The new Government, at the earnest request of her creditors, turned an early attention to the public debt. She found the contracts were with the original creditor, bearer, or assignee. The holder was equally a party to the contract, and demanded the whole debt, without regard to the sum paid for it to the original holder; on the other hand, many contended for the right of the first creditor as an equitable demand to the surplus, (or at least a part of it,) after paying the principal and interest of the sum for which it was transferred. To this it was answered, that Congress could not consider themselves as a Court of Law or Equity to determine these claims; they were bound to A, B or bearer, or his assignee; the holder of the evidence of the public debt could alone, in law or equity, give a discharge of the debt; that it would be unconstitutional to destroy the contract of the parties, when made bona fide, and it was agreed that fraud could vitiate every contract for which the Courts of Justice were adequate; therefore it was, that all discrimination was refused; first, as a matter without the jurisdiction of Congress; secondly, as a matter unjust, on the principle of a fair contract made on a risk to be run; and, lastly, as impracticable in its very nature. In consequence of this, propositions were made to the holders of the public securities on the principles of the Funding System; the substance of which were, that as the Government in its infancy could not embrace a discharge of the debt, or, indeed, a payment of full interest, without risking the public credit as heretofore, and by this means again exposing the creditor to loss, it was therefore advisable to new-modify the debt, so that the creditor should give up three per cent. upon the interest, and two per cent. on the principal, for ten years, for which he should receive an equivalent in the following manner: It was a very reasonable conjecture, in case the new Government succeeded and public credit was restored, that interest would fall in five years to five per cent., and in ten years to four per cent.; in which case Congress might, by new loans, at that rate of interest, pay off the whole national debt: but on the present plan, she would secure to the holder full four per cent. on the principal for ten years, and afterwards six per cent. for a certain number of years, on terms, with three per cent. on the interest let the common rate of interest be what it might. This was accepted by the creditor as a reasonable equivalent, and the debt was subscribed.

The event proved the truth of the supposition, and the value of the Funded Debt at one time rose to twenty-five shillings on the pound on six per cent., while loans have been made by the United States at from four to five per cent. Congress then gave a certainty of six per cent. for a number of years, on the terms of the loans for a partial reduction for ten years, and a less interest on the arrears of interest then due. This was certainly a full and generous equivalent; and the only advantage gained by the public was, a modification of the debt, by which the burden would be divided, and the increased number of citizens, during fourteen or fifteen years, would bear their proportion of the expense of a war in the benefit of which they so essentially participated. At the time of funding the public debt, the irredeemable quality was considered as a full equivalent and a compliance with the public faith. Mr. B. alleged that he was then a public creditor, and considered it in that point of light. He was a creditor that had a right to feel a loss as much as any man. He was a creditor of 1776, when the Army could not be sent to Canada without hard money. He was a creditor in 1777, when the prisoners were perishing for want of food and clothing, and the Government could not furnish a single suit, or a tolerable supply, for their extreme distress. He was a creditor of 1778, when, at the Valley Forge, the tracks of the soldiers were marked with blood for want of shoes, which he collected in different parts of the State by his own exertions, and at his own expense, without fee or reward, and was not repaid till 1779. He was a large creditor of 1779, when Congress sent to all parts of the Union earnestly calling on the friends of their country to come forward with loans for the public exigencies; and he was a creditor as an officer of the Army, in which he had served. Under this view of the subject, Mr. B. acknowledged that he had entertained great jealousies lest some other end was aimed at by the present resolution than the ostensible one; this was raised when he heard gentlemen found the success of the resolution on the savings made by the Funding System, when those gentlemen had for years past been continually representing that system as founded on an extravagant waste of public treasure; that the irredeemability of the debt was a tax on the Government which ought never to have been admitted, as moneys might have been loaned at four per cent., and by that means one-third of the debt saved to the Union. What ideas, then, must we form of a resolution calculated to raise the hopes of the memorialists, which, in the end, would certainly turn out a mere shadow, and worse than a shadow? This, really, was trifling with the complaints of our fellow-citizens. There had been no savings. The creditors who had possession of the public contracts had received a full equivalent for their demand by their own free consent, at twenty shillings in the pound. Where, then, was room for a demand on the Government for any saving? If there was a foundation for a claim, it must be against the possessors of the certificates; but however just it might be, it was merely illusory to form the resolution on principles that had no existence.

The losses sustained by the line of the Army were not peculiar to them as creditors of the United States. All classes of citizens who had generously advanced their money for the support of this very Army in food, clothing, arms, and ammunition, as well as that of the Government itself at home and abroad, had been equal sufferers, without the emolument which the Army had received, in the most distressing times of the war. The Army had been a refuge for many gentlemen driven from their homes, while other citizens were obliged to wander for a considerable time without employ or relief. He extended his observations to other citizens who had suffered during the war, and particularly mentioned the sufferers at Falmouth, Charlestown, New York, Norfolk, Yorktown, and South Carolina, as those who were of the first class in the United States; as also the aged, the widows, and the orphan creditors, who had suffered without receiving any advantage whatever from the public bounty.

Mr. B. then proceeded to consider the practicability of the measure, supposing its equality and justice to be fairly established. As the application was now founded on the savings on each man's individual certificate, the principle equally reached every public creditor. Suppose, then, A, B, C, D, and E, received their certificates together: A sold his at six shillings and eight pence in the pound to raise a capital to purchase public lands, which, at one time in this city, sold at six pence per acre; B sold his certificate at two shillings and six pence in the pound, to save a wife and children from starving; C sold his to raise a capital to go into the speculating line; D sold on one day from necessity, but replaced it the next day, and kept it till the Funding System took place, and then sold at twenty shillings in the pound; while E, having confidence in the Government, and not being under a necessity of selling, funded it under the present system. How could a discrimination take place here? or would it be fair equally to remunerate all these original holders? But suppose some had sold at twenty shillings, and also had received all the emoluments of the Pennsylvania line; where would be the distributive justice of the measure now proposed? If you extend this doctrine to the public creditors at large, it will appear in a strong point of light. It is well known that the common practice of the Government during the war, was, to issue certificates in fictitious names—the names of clerks in office, of heads of departments, or other persons—merely to make them answer the purpose of a paper currency; as they were payable to bearer, the name was never thought to be material. The person doing the service or lending his money received these certificates, and was really the original holder, yet the face of the certificate spoke a different language. In this case a discrimination would be impossible; and much the largest part of the public debt was contracted in this way, after the war was over. Many debts had been paid by merchants and others to their foreign creditors and others, in certificates at their nominal value; and, in other cases, individuals had failed, and the loss had wholly fallen on their creditors. Mr. B. earnestly contended that the expense of a discrimination would exceed the revenues of the United States. The nature of transferable stock, which is designed to operate as current money, forbids the idea of a discrimination, and all public credit must necessarily fail if such a doctrine was to prevail in the finances of the Union. This was a very serious and important idea, worthy the attention of the applicants, who certainly were interested in the public weal. The right of freemen to dispose of their own property as they please, was involved in the question: for if the Government was to make up every loss on a transfer, then it ought not to be made without their consent. Mr. B. hoped he would not be understood to deny either the services or the sufferings of the Army; but he alleged the promised recompense was given, which had been transferred with all the legal and equitable right to the holder, who had received from Government the full value, and therefore no further demand either in law or equity remained against the Government. The negotiable quality was a principle in the securities insisted on by the Army, and which they had used as they chose, for different purposes, and from different views. He acknowledged that the generosity, benevolence, and humanity of Congress, had been addressed to this he answered, that they were but stewards of the people's property, for which they were answerable; that they were not sent here to show their generosity; it was to do justice; and that not to one class, but to every description of citizens. He knew of but one rule for every citizen of the United States. They were all equally represented in that House; but at all events it became them to be just before they were generous.

Mr. B. assured the House that he had taken up so much of their time, because he found that no one had come forward fairly to meet the question, and he had too great a regard for the memorialists to wish them to go away under the idea that anything had been refused to them which ought in propriety to have been done. At any rate, he had candidly and above-board given the reasons of his vote on this important occasion, which would be against the question proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Committee now rose, without taking any question.

Pay of the Late Army.

TUESDAY, January 13.

An engrossed bill relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them, upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States; which was read twice and committed.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for placing on the pension list all such officers and privates of the Militia as have been or shall be wounded or disabled in the service of the United States, and not provided for by law."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That the memorial and petition of sundry merchants of the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, engaged in commerce previous to the late Revolution, which was presented to this House at the last session, stating the particular hardships under which they labor, from the twofold causes of the operation of the fourth article of the definitive Treaty of Peace, and of so much of the act of Congress for funding the public debt, as redeems the old Continental money, at the rate of one hundred dollars thereof for one dollar specie; the former requiring them to pay their British debts in sterling money, with full interest to the present time; and the latter depriving them of all hope of indemnity from the effects of depreciation and tender laws, to which they were exposed during the war, and praying relief," be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House to whom are referred the memorials of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

This motion occasioned a debate; those who opposed it, contended that it was a distinct and different case from that of the officers; that it involved a very different investigation and could not therefore be connected with it; and that it appeared to be designed to embarrass and perplex the application of the officers.

In support of the motion, a variety of reasons were adduced to show that the cases were parallel, and that there was no propriety in making a distinction between different classes of citizens in their application for relief in similar cases. After considerable debate,

The previous question being called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said motion, be now put?"

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 24, as follows:

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said motion, it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 30, as follows:

PAY OF THE LATE ARMY.

The petitions of the officers of the late Army being under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the following motion was made by Mr. GERRY, viz:

"Resolved, As the opinion of this Committee, that provision be made for such officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the late Army of the United States, who received certificates for the balances due to them on a final settlement of their respective accounts: Provided, That such provision shall not exceed the difference between the nominal amount of the said certificates and the real amount, estimated at the present rates in the market, of the certificates which are or may be issued for those first mentioned, pursuant to an act making provision for the Debt of the United States."

Mr. CLARK moved an amendment, which was to insert in the first clause after the word "for," all persons who have received liquidated certificates for services rendered or supplies furnished during the late war; and, on this motion to amend, Mr. HARTLEY made the following observations:

Mr. H. wished that a question upon the prayer of the petitions might be fairly taken, without any embarrassment or connexion with another subject. Let us, he said, consider and discuss the claims of the officers and soldiers of the late Army, and either grant them, or dismiss their petitions with decency. The gentleman from New Jersey yesterday came forward with a resolution, expressing that the prayer of the petitioners could not be granted. If this was consistent with his opinion, it was candid; he appeared openly to avow his sentiments. I cannot say quite so much in his favor to-day for withdrawing his motion. Indeed, the motion presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts comes forward in so questionable a shape, that I am at a loss to know who are friends or enemies to the objects of the petitioners. To adopt the proposed amendment, I consider as death to the motion on the table; it embraces too much; it contemplates what the abilities of this country are not competent to. I hope it will not be agreed to. The officers and soldiers attempt to show that there is a distinction between their case and other citizens; besides, what have they to hope from the bounty and magnanimity of the nation? It may not be amiss for me here to mention, that I have never had a certificate, and that I am not personally interested in the question. I was an officer in part of the war, but have nothing to ask for here. I consider that the officers and soldiers have a claim of justice as well as equity, besides what they might expect from the magnanimity of the nation. I shall say but a few words on the sufferings and distress of the Army; they were great, and unexampled in the history of mankind. Those who are now present, and were either in the Cabinet or field, must know the force of my observation. I will not detail the scenes of misery exhibited during the war. To support the rights and liberties of the country, officers and soldiers freely entered into the service. In the year 1776, the officers had half-pay; in the year 1777, the pay was nominally increased, but unfortunately depreciation came on, and their actual compensation was less than the year before. I have a respect for a militiaman, but his case cannot be compared, in point of difficulties and danger, to that of the officer and soldier—the former occasionally called forth, the latter constantly at the post of danger and duty. There was certainly an inequality in their situations, which ought to have been compensated for to the soldier. The officer who was married, though he could meet the dangers of the field himself, yet could not view with fortitude the poverty and misfortune which threatened his family.

Congress had made no provision to grant half-pay to the officers (who should serve to the end of the war) until some time in the year 1778. Several officers who were well attached to the cause, owing to their necessities and the circumstances of their families, were obliged to resign. The Commander-in-Chief saw the evils which threatened his country and the Army; he stated them to Congress; some strong promises and appearances were absolutely necessary on the part of Government, or the Army would not be kept together. These were made in the most solemn manner. Many officers and soldiers were retained. Depreciation still continued. The soldier, hungry and forlorn, was obliged to take the paper that was offered him by the Government. This was not in general the case with the farmer; the latter most commonly parted with his property voluntarily. One kind of paper followed another during the war; each depreciated; but still Congress, by repeated resolutions, (in order to induce the officers and soldiers to remain at their post,) engaged that they should be compensated at the end of the war. Certificates of different kinds were issued; and I believe Congress, and the whole American world, expected they were to be paid in specie as soon as there was sufficient ability in the Government. And I still think there is a difference between their claims and those of other citizens. At the first session of Congress under the present Government, the House resolved that they would support the public credit; and strong expressions were used. This gave great confidence to the public; certificates were enhanced in value, and many of them had passed into the hands of strangers, under the faith of Government; so that, when the Funding bill passed, nothing could be done without the consent of the holders. I wished exceedingly for an opportunity to give my aid in favor of the officers and soldiers who had served to the end of the war. It was a voluntary act in the holder to fund his debt at about four per cent., and it appears there is a considerable saving to Government out of the earnings of the officer and soldier, and which may fairly and honorably be granted to them. I mean to reach this. Those who concur with me in sentiment, ought to be against the amendment now under consideration, and assist to alter the motion so as to embrace the objects we have in view.

The Committee rose without coming to any conclusion.

WEDNESDAY, January 16.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the memorials of the late officers and soldiers of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said memorials under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which being amended to read as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that the prayer of the memorials of the officers and soldiers of several of the lines of the late Army of the United States, ought not to be granted."

The question was taken, that the House do agree to the said resolution, and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 43, nays 10, as follows:

N. Y. A.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Elbridge Gerry, William B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, Thomas Hartley, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, John Page, and Thomas Tredwell.

Ordered, That Mr. GAVES be added to the committee appointed the 14th of November last, to take into consideration that part of the President's Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed in last session, for the regulation of the Post Office, in the room of Mr. STEELE, excused from serving thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MERCER be added to the committee to whom was recommitted the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair.

THURSDAY, January 17.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations."

INDIAN TRADE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, which lay on the table;—when

Mr. MADISON's amendment came up for consideration, viz: to strike out the eighth section, which provided that no sale of land made by any tribe of Indians shall be valid to any person or State, whether such State may have the right of pre-emption or not, unless the same be made and executed at some public treaty held for that purpose, under the authority of the United States: And in lieu thereof, to insert a new section, declaring that no person shall be capable of acquiring any title to any lands beyond the Indian boundaries, and within those of the United States, by purchase, gift, or otherwise, from the Indians claiming the same; and that it shall be a misdemeanor in any person, punishable by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of a jury, to obtain, accept, or treat for any title to such lands. And when any Indians shall desire, of their own accord, to sell any part of their lands, and it shall be deemed for the interest of the United States that a purchase shall be made, the same shall be done no otherwise than by a treaty to be entered into pursuant to the Constitution; the lands so purchased to enure to the use of whoever may have the right of pre-emption thereto, and who shall pay the price thereof.

Mr. MADISON observed, that misunderstandings, quarrels, and wars with the Indians, had originated from the circumstance of persons having obtained, through fraud, or other improper means, possession of lands belonging to the Indians. This consideration rendered it highly important that this whole business should be under the absolute and sole direction of the public authority, in order to guard effectually against the fatal consequences which may result to the public by being precipitated into a war, through the arts of unprincipled persons, who, while the public are made to sustain great calamities, often find means to extricate themselves from bearing their proportion of its inconveniences and expenses.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved, that the words "at the discretion of a jury;" "and it shall be deemed for the interest of the United States that a purchase shall be made," be struck out.

Mr. BARNWELL objected to the amendment. He thought the original section as comprehensive as the other; that it was better worded, and liable to fewer exceptions; for though the latter is longer, yet, sales made pursuant to treaties held under an authority not expressly pointed out, would be liable to cavil and revision; and the persons holding a treaty for the purpose of making purchases, are exposed to a penalty.

Mr. GILES preferred the substitute, because it provided a penalty for improper purchases.

Mr. FITZSIMONS proposed to retain the original section, and to amend it, by inserting after the word sale, or gift; and to add the penalty contained in the substitute.

The original section was struck out, and the new section was amended as proposed; and the bill and amendment were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 18.

An engrossed bill to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN TUCKER.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to compensate John Tucker.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved to fill the blank with five hundred and nine dollars. Mr. TUCKER's petition stated that his actual expenses in attending on the Court five different times amounted to three hundred dollars, and that he paid nine dollars for a seal for the Circuit Court of Rhode Island.

The motion was opposed. It was said that it would establish a dangerous precedent for the Government to pay the voluntary expenses of an applicant for an appointment under the United States; and that in the present case the actual services only ought to be compensated according to the provision made by a subsequent law. In reply it was said, that it was taken for granted Mr. TUCKER had applied for the appointment, but no evidence of this is adduced; several circumstances were mentioned to show that the contrary was the fact, and that he was called to discharge the duties of the office. The question is, whether he ought not to have his necessary expenses, incurred in attending the courts reimbursed?

The motion for five hundred and nine dollars was superseded by a motion for three hundred and nine dollars, which was agreed to. The Committee rose and reported the bill with this amendment; which was adopted by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to make provision of half-pay for seven years, to the widows and orphans of such officers of the Army of the United States as have been killed in the service, since the third day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, or who may hereafter be killed in the service of the United States."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Joseph Henderson; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report; and, on the question that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the same, it passed in the negative.

And then the said report being amended at the Clerk's table to read as follows:

"Resolved, That there be allowed to Joseph Henderson a yearly salary of one hundred dollars, for his services as Paymaster to the Navy Board for the Eastern Department, from the tenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, to the tenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, being four years; and that the officers of the Treasury be authorized to pass the same to his credit, and to settle his account accordingly."

It was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. AMES, Mr. BENJAMIN BOWEN, and Mr. CLARK, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

MONDAY, January 21.

An engrossed bill to compensate John Tucker was read the third time, and ordered to be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMSON from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of sick and infirm seamen; which was read twice, and committed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," was read twice, and committed.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States, reported an amendatory bill; which was received, read twice, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into the said Committee; when

Mr. GILES moved that the proviso in the second section of the bill should be struck out, respecting the assent of the individual States to the new Loan, as it does not agree with the idea precisely contained in the resolutions on which the bill was founded; and, adhering to the provision contained in the Funding Law respecting these balances, he observed, that the bill now reported interfered with the disposition of the balances, whereas that law has vested the disposition of them exclusively in the several States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that there was a variation in the proviso in the bill, from that in the original resolutions, which had accidentally taken place. He said, that the variation was certainly not in order, and he therefore moved that the proviso in the bill should be amended so as to conform to the resolutions.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked, that the gentleman last speaking was undoubtedly right in respect to the point of order, but he did not draw the same conclusion. The proviso in the bill may vary from that in the resolutions; but if it more completely comports with the ideas of a majority of the Committee, he saw no good reason for not adopting it. He added some observations on the remarks of Mr. GILES, which he considered as making it a question, whether the Government should literally comply with its engagements or not? This, he hoped, would never be made a subject of debate in the Legislature of the United States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he hoped the amendment which he suggested, would take place.

Mr. CLARK observed, that he thought the bill was altogether wrong; he moved, therefore, that it should be recommitted. Mr. C. entered into a general consideration of the subject.

Mr. LAURANCE was in favor of the Committee's rising. He cited an instance in point, which occurred the last session. A select committee on the census had exceeded the limits of the principles agreed to in the Committee of the Whole; the bill they reported was accordingly recommitted; the House would not then consent to altering the bill in the House, as it would sanction a deviation from established principles.

Mr. MURRAY was opposed to the Committee's rising; he saw no occasion for it; the variation is merely verbal, and can be easily corrected.

The question for the Committee's rising was put, and agreed to. They accordingly rose, and reported progress. On motion, the Committee of the Whole was discharged. The bill was then recommitted to the select committee which reported it. The requisite alteration being made, the bill, as amended, was reported to the House twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee proceeded in the discussion of the bill.

Mr. MENCER, after stating that various unfriendly remarks were made on the Government, and on particular members, in consequence of the former assumption, and informing the Committee that there was a large sum of the paper money of a particular State in this town, which was selling at ten shillings in the pound, observed that this bill would appreciate the value of that paper perhaps to 20s. in the pound. In order, therefore, to give the fullest information to the people of the United States, and to prevent those at seven or eight hundred miles distance from being defrauded, he moved an amendment, the object of which was to prevent certificates which have been transferred within a certain period from being subscribed to the loan.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, as he had brought forward the resolutions on which the bill was founded, he thought it incumbent on him to notice the observations advanced by the gentleman in support of his motion. He remarked, that with respect to the general sentiment of the people, perhaps he knew as little about it as others; but this he knew, that if unfavorable impressions had not been made, it was not because attempts had been wanting for that purpose on the part of individuals within these walls. With respect to himself, he felt no solicitude; but if any member of this House knew of any facts of the kind alluded to by the gentleman, let the person who knows of such things boldly come forward and charge openly the guilty; with respect to the present motion, he would have no objections to it, provided it did not interfere with the general provisions of the bill.

Mr. BOURNE said, he should be in favor of the motion, provided it was practicable; but he did not see how it could be carried into execution.

Mr. WILLIAMSON supported the motion. He said it met his approbation so far as it would conduce to protecting the original holders of the State debts from such speculations as they suffered at the time of the former assumption.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked on the rapid rise of the value of the paper, in consequence of the former assumption, and said, that, considering what human nature was constituted of, the speculations alluded to, and which he had lamented as much as any man whatever, were to have been expected. He then adverted particularly to the remarks of Mr. MENCER, in which he had said he had his suspicions even of the members of the House. Mr. SEDGWICK said, the ears of members had been often assailed by insinuations and suspicions of the base conduct of individuals in this House, as speculating in their own measures. If, said Mr. SEDGWICK, there is so base and infamous a character within these walls; if there is one member of this House who has been guilty of this abominable conduct, of plundering his constituents of their property, in the manner represented, let his name be mentioned, let the man be pointed out. From the part he had taken in this matter from the beginning, and from the suggestions which had been circulated, he had some reason to suppose it might be intended to implicate him in the charge. He could not help feeling himself called upon to notice such indiscriminate insinuations, such attempts to affix a stigma on particular characters; men whose reputation is their dearest possession. Mr. SEDGWICK then offered several objections to the motion; he remarked that its tendency would be to keep open the door of speculation.

Mr. MENCER replied to Mr. SEDGWICK; he observed, that his remarks were directed to human nature at large; he considered it as a point not to be controverted that temptation, in proportion to its extensive and flattering prospects, would always have an influence; for himself, he could never wish to have his own honor and integrity put to the test. He subscribed to the sentiments of Mr. SEDGWICK, respecting the sacred nature of reputation, and repeated the lines from Shakspeare:

"He that robs me of my good name," &c.

Mr. WHITE said he disapproved of the principle on which the amendment was brought forward. He believed the aspersions on the members of Congress were totally unfounded. He did not doubt but speculations had been carried on to a very great extent, during the dependence of the Funding Act; but this could not be avoided; men would venture according to their opinion of the final event of the measure, and prices would consequently fluctuate. When the proposition for dis-crimination was brought forward, the price of paper fell: when it was rejected the price rose again. It was probably the same with regard to the State Debts, in the various stages of the subject; but surely no suspicion of improper conduct could fall on those who voted uniformly either for or against the measure. Indeed the above has generally fallen on those who opposed the assumption in the extent first proposed, and voted for it as finally modified. These were but five in number; they were easily known; three yet retain their seats, two are of the same State with the gentleman who offered the amendment, and are not now members of the House; that he was of the number, and he was confident that no man applying the charge of speculation to himself or to any one of those who voted with him, would believe there was the shadow of truth in it; but he would attend to the discussion; and, however he might dislike the reason assigned for offering the amendment, if he found any good likely to arise from it, would give it his vote.

Mr. MENCER's remarks brought out several other members, who, severally adverted to the circumstances attending the passing the Funding Act, showed that though they had voted for the system, that they were not influenced by personal considerations.

The motion of Mr. MENCER was repeatedly modified and altered, and then further debated.

Mr. BARNWELL said, he disapproved of the motion; it appeared to be a very extraordinary measure indeed; the ostensible motive is to prevent speculation, but it will have directly the contrary effect. The way, in his opinion, to prevent speculation, was to appreciate the value of the certificates in the hands of the holders; but what will be the effect of this measure? it will lessen the value of the paper immediately, by preventing the possession or from transferring the property. This he considered as a retrospective measure, and that the Government had no right to abridge the right of transferring; it is a quality of the property, and cannot be taken away by any subsequent law. He considered the measure as counteracting the principles of the bill altogether, the design of which is to give a value to the paper in the hands of the owners. In every view of the proposition he was opposed to it; and though it appears designed to benefit the distant creditors, yet he felt so fully persuaded that it would operate to the disadvantage of his constituents, that he should under every modification vote against it.

Mr. MADISON replied to Mr. BARNWELL; he observed, that the gentleman argued from proper principles, if they had been applied to a different case. The present proposition of providing for these balances is a voluntary business, which this Government is under no obligation to engage in; but having engaged in it, the measures it may adopt on the occasion, have no necessary reference to, or connexion with the general regulations under which the paper now exists; the Government may make just what arrangements it thinks proper. The provision now contemplated, he remarked, was however to be justified on its own merits; the uses and the consequences resulting from it, were designed to be salutary; and with respect to persons remote from the Seat of Government, who are equally entitled to protection in every sense with those who reside there, they would evidently be benefited by the regulation.

Mr. MURRAY opposed the motion, as being hostile to the public faith, as involving an infraction of that faith, so far at least as the value of the certificates have been enhanced in consequence of what has already been done.

Several other members spoke on the occasion; and the motion was at length negatived by the Committee.

TUESDAY, January 22.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his Report on the petition of Thomas Wishart; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, and packthread, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, was presented to the House and read, praying the attention of Congress to the said manufacture, by repealing the drawback of the duties imposed by law on the reshipment and exportation of cordage, twine, and packthread, of foreign manufacture; and allowing a drawback of the aforesaid duties on foreign hemp, in case of its being manufactured and reshipped in the United States, or otherwise, as to the wisdom of Congress may seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. GOODRUE, and Mr. MOORE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to promote commerce by the increase of American seamen; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, made on the 8th of May last: whereupon,

Resolved, That the Accounting Officers of the Treasury cause the account of Colonel Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, for his traveling and passage expenses, incurred in coming to America and joining the Army of the United States, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, being seven hundred and forty-six dollars, to be settled, and the amount thereof to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GROVE, Mr. SCHOONMAKER, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, do prepare and bring in the same.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize a Loan, in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States:

Mr. MENCER's proviso was again under consideration, some objection being made, Mr. MENCER offered the proposition in a new form, still preserving the original object respecting transfers or sales of certificates. The debate was renewed on this motion. The question being at length taken, the proposition was negatived—32 to 28.

[JANUARY, 1793.]

The second section being read, Mr. STURGES moved an addition, which authorizes the States respectively to prescribe the several species of the notes or certificates which shall be subscribed to the loan. This was agreed to.

A proviso was moved by Mr. WILLIAMSON to the following purport: "That no certificate of any State shall be considered as the debts of the State which shall not be recognised as such by the Legislature thereof within twelve months after the same shall have been subscribed." Without deciding on this, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, January 23.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing a return of the election of WILLIAM HINDMAN, to serve as one of the members of this House, for the said State, in the room of JOSHUA SENEY, who has resigned his seat; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A member, in his place, laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Kentucky, enclosing a representation from the Legislature of the said State, respecting an adjustment of a claim of that State against the United States, for the expense of certain expeditions against the Indians; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LOANS AND FINANCES.

Mr. GILES submitted to the consideration of the House certain resolutions; after reading which, he proceeded to mention the reasons which had influenced him in moving them. The resolutions are as follows:

"Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before this House copies of the authorities under which loans have been negotiated, pursuant to the act of the fourth and twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, together with copies of the authorities directing the application of the moneys borrowed.

"Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause this House to be furnished with the names of the persons by whom, and to whom, the respective payments of the French debt have been made in France, pursuant to the act for that purpose; specifying the dates of the respective drafts upon the Commissioners in Holland, and the dates of the respective payments of the debt. A similar statement is requested respecting the debts to Spain and Holland.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account exhibiting, half-monthly, the balances between the United States and the Bank of the United States, including the several Branch Banks, from the commencement of those Institutions, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of all moneys which may have come into the Sinking Fund, from the commencement of that Institution to the present time; specifying the particular fund from which they have accrued, and exhibiting, half-yearly, the sums uninvested, and where deposited.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the balance of all unapplied revenues at the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, specifying whether in money or bonds, and noting where the money is deposited; that he also make report of all unapplied moneys which may have been obtained by the several loans authorized by law, and where such moneys are now deposited."

The resolutions, said Mr. GILES, have grown out of the embarrassments I have met with in attempting to comprehend the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in pursuance of an order of this House of the 27th of December, 1792, exhibiting sundry statements respecting foreign loans. These embarrassments have increased in proportion to the attention which I have bestowed on the subject; and a number of official papers to which I have had reference for information, instead of elucidating, seem rather to obscure the inquiry. To obtain necessary information, and no one can doubt the immediate applicability of this information to a bill now lying upon your table, for the purpose of relieving the loan of $2,000,000 made of the Bank of the United States, by opening a new loan for that sum abroad, and by changing the application of the like sum already borrowed and appropriated to the discharge of the debt to France from its original destination to the immediate discharge of the debt to the Bank.

The first resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report of the Secretary of the Treasury which exhibits the terms upon which various loans have been made abroad, but neither presents the precise authorities under which those negotiations have been made, nor the precise amount of the sums borrowed for the separate and distinct objects of the two acts mentioned in the resolution.

Another reason has more strongly suggested the propriety of calling for the information requested by this resolution. The bill now upon your table, which has been before alluded to, contemplates the whole of the moneys borrowed from abroad, and now on hand, as being originally appropriated to the discharge of the French debt, and proposes to change the original destination of these identical moneys; and the reason assigned for this measure has been the unsettled state of affairs in France.

In the printed Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he remarks that the same moneys are applicable to the Sinking Fund. It appears strange, that after express and distinct appropriations by law, that any misunderstanding relative to this object should exist, and the information called for may possibly explain this seeming contradiction.

The second resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report marked B, and which exhibits the payments made to France, but does not furnish the names of the persons engaged in those negotiations, nor does it present to view the length of time those persons have been possessed of the public moneys, by stating the dates of the respective drafts in Holland, and the dates of the actual application of the moneys to the discharge of the debt; and it is evident that from the times the loans are respectively created, to the times of the actual application of the moneys borrowed, the United States are paying the usual interest upon the debt intended to be redeemed, and the stipulated interest upon the moneys borrowed for the redemption. This remark is equally applicable to the payments of other foreign debts with the payments of the debt to France.

The third resolution has arisen from calculations drawn partly from the last page of the printed report, and from the original Bank book of the United States, from which it appears that the balances in Bank in favor of the United States were as follows:

In Bank, Philadelphia, 30th May, 1792, and 16th June, same year, in branch banks $676,952 55
1792, June 30th, in all banks in the United States 555,271 22
July 28th and 31st, in all banks in the United States 511,423 91
August 25th, 30th, and 31st, in all banks in the United States 740,903 87

On the 1st of June, a loan was negotiated with the Bank of the United States on the part of the United States, for $100,000, at 5 per cent. per annum. On the 1st of July, another loan was made upon the same terms for the like sum. On the 1st of August, another loan was made upon the same terms for the like sum. On the 1st of September, another loan was made upon the same terms for the like sum. It appears from the last page of the printed Report, that there had been drawn into America, from the 15th of December, 1790, to the 27th of January, 1792, of the moneys borrowed abroad, the sum of 2,663,921 florins, 2 stivers, and 6 deniers. If this sum were expended, and lodged in the bank at the times of making these loans, (and Congress have never yet been informed of any deficiency of revenue,) the United States will, of consequence, have paid upon the moneys borrowed from the Bank of the United States, from 15 to 17 per cent. per annum, to wit: they will have paid 5 per cent. upon the original debt to France, 5 per cent. upon the moneys borrowed for its redemption, exclusive of douceurs and other charges, and 5 per cent. upon the sum borrowed of the bank, which may be deemed part of this deposit made in the Bank by the United States. But, discarding these inferences, it must at least be admitted that the United States are paying 5 per cent. for the loan of moneys from the Bank, when a sum larger than the loan itself, is actually deposited in Bank. It is here to be remarked, that a balance of cash is admitted, by the Treasurer's return, to have been in his hands on the 31st of December, 1790, amounting to $973,342 43, and in July 30, 1791, the sum of $582,189 54.

I am informed that bills are often drawn in favor of the Bank for moneys in the hands of the revenue officers in distant parts of the United States, and that credit is entered in the Bank book upon the receipt of such bills, although the moneys may not actually be in Bank for some time after the credit is entered, and hence it is inferred that the Bank-book does not conclusively show the real sum in Bank, not to mention that such bills answer all the purposes of cash, and ought therefore to be credited upon the receipt of them. It is to be remarked that there is a regular and continual influx of moneys into the Bank by the operation of these bills. It is not very material whether a bill lodged in Bank to-day, should be paid to-day, provided something like the same sum should be paid in consequence of a bill lodged in Bank one or two months ago, and the bill of to-day should be paid one or two months hence. The following statement will, in some measure, explain this idea, by exhibiting half-monthly the balances of public money in all the banks, about the middle and end of each month, beginning with May, 1792, and ending with December of the same year:

May	$340,322 11
May	332,116 35
June	776,107 65
June	523,272 22
July	441,637 13
July	521,426 91
August	743,470 19
August	740,903 08
September	696,302 23
September	367,981 25
October	456,895 52
October	473,388 99
November	681,250 09
November	811,212 51
December 15	1,020,824 73
December 22, and January 5—	790,642 11

The fourth resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report which remarks that the residue of the sum drawn from Holland, amounting to $1,668,188 27 is applicable to the purchase of the public debt. It is known that the sum of $1,374,656 40, being the surplus of the revenue up to the end of December, 1790, was originally appropriated to the Sinking Fund; that the surplus of other appropriations have been applied to this fund, and that the interest of the debt purchased has also been wholly appropriated to its increase. It is also known that between $1,100,000 and $1,200,000, and no more, of the original appropriation, have been really invested in the purchase of the debt; it is, therefore, somewhat unaccountable that so large a sum as $1,668,188 should be drawn from the loans abroad, when the Sinking Fund has always overflowed from domestic resources, and when the probability of purchasing is extremely lessened by the rise in the price of paper and the limitations of the last act of Congress upon that subject. It would not be deemed an economical arrangement to make a loan of so large a sum of money upon terms by no means honorable or advantageous, and appropriate it to the purchase of the debt under limitations which would forbid its investment. The information called for in this resolution may possibly explain these difficulties.

H. or R.]

Loans and Finances.

[JANUARY, 1793.]

The fifth and last resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report (page 5) which states the whole sums drawn from Holland to amount to $2,304,769 13; but neither immediately presents to view the balance on hand, nor informs where that balance is deposited. It appears by the Bank-book, that the whole deposits of the United States in Bank at this time, from all resources, amounts to $790,642 11. Hence, it will appear from a statement partly conjectural, and partly founded upon the statements in the printed Report, and some official documents, that $1,554,851 43 remain unaccounted for, as will appear from the following account:

Sums which ought to be in the Treasury.

Whole moneys drawn from Holland, as stated in the printed Report, page 5	$2,304,769
Deduct paid for St. Domingo, as stated in printed Report, page 5	455,263
Leaves a balance of	1,859,506
Deduct to foreign officers, if paid	191,316
Leaves a balance of	1,668,190
Add surplus of Sinking Fund, conjectural	400,000
Add surplus of revenue of 1792, reported at	277,385
Whole amount	2,345,495
Sums not taken into this estimate: First. Any moneys not paid of the $191,316, due to foreign officers. Second. So much moneys in Bank as arose from the revenues. Third. The receipts of the current year.
From this aggregate sum of	$2,345,495
Deduct in Bank	790,642
Balance not accounted for	1,554,853

In this last estimate, cents have not been taken into calculation, which makes an inconsiderable variation in some of the sums.

Another circumstance appears somewhat singular: in the printed Report, 2,986,000 florins are stated to have been drawn from Holland in the year 1792. In the Bank-book, it appears from the list of bills drawn, that 8,695,237 florins were drawn for in the same time. This difference, I presume, may admit of explanation probably from the manner of negotiating this matter, or from some casual mistake. It deserves, however, to be explained.

It appears from another statement, made up to the 1st of April, 1793, that there ought to be at that time a sufficient sum of money in the Treasury to reimburse the loan of 2,000,000 dollars to the Bank, and to answer all the other purposes of Government.

States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMSON's proviso was taken into consideration.

Mr. MACON offered another, in lieu of Mr. WILLIAMSON's; the purport specifying particularly certain notes of the State of North Carolina, which that State had procured, and which he proposed should be excluded from the loan now under consideration. The certificates are those issued at Warrenton, in 1786; certificates to pay for a militia expedition against the Indians in 1788; and certificates signed Patrick Travers.

Mr. WILLIAMSON withdrew his motion, and that moved by Mr. MACON was agreed to.

Several other amendments were moved, but not agreed to.

The Committee, having gone through with the discussion of the bill, rose, and reported it, with sundry amendments. The House took the same into consideration, and agreed thereto.

Mr. MERCER then renewed his motion for a proviso respecting assignments or transfers of State certificates. The object is, to exclude from the loans all certificates so transferred or assigned, from the first day of January, 1793, to the first day of June following.

Some further debate took place. It was urged in support of the motion, that the provision now to be made for a certain description of creditors, is merely a benefit; in conferring which, the Government had a right to annex what conditions they thought proper; that it was the duty of the Legislature to take measures to prevent those at a distance from the Seat of Government from being speculated upon, to their great injury and loss; that imputations have been thrown upon the members of the Legislature, in respect to the advantages taken of the uninformed on the first assumption; and therefore, as an opportunity is now offered to the House to purge themselves of all suspicions of improper motives, the amendment ought to take place. In answer to the objection on the proviso's being retrospective, it was said, that it had relation to such assignments or transfers only, as have taken place since this act originated.

In opposition to the proviso, it was said, that the present bill was not merely a bounty or benefit conferred on the creditors; it is a measure just, reasonable, and proper in itself; and on this principle only it is to be justified. It was further urged, that the proviso was unconstitutional, having a most manifest retrospective operation, interfering with contracts which the parties at the time had a most undoubted right to make, and thus altering the value of their property; it was reviving the principle of discrimination between the original holders and the assignees, a principle that had been so pointedly reprobated by a large majority of the Legislature on a former occasion.

A motion was then made, and seconded, further to amend the said bill, and debate arising thereupon, an adjournment was called for, and the House adjourned.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them, upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States; whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, further to amend the said bill, by adding, to the end of the second section, the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, That no such notes or certificates shall be subscribable in any name, other than that of the original owner, if living, or if dead, of his legal representative, and except such as are, or may be, transferred by executors, administrators, or assigns, under any bankrupt act, unless accompanied with an affidavit, certified by a magistrate, that the transfer or assignment to the party, in whose name and behalf the subscription is offered, was not made at any time between the first day of January and the first day of June next, and that such party is the true and bona fide proprietor thereof."

It passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 33, as follows:

FRIDAY, January 25.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the adjustment of a claim of Joseph Henderson against the United States; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill granting further compensation to certain Receivers of Continental taxes; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question, that the said bill be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 22, nays 24, as follows:

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

An engrossed bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them, upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States, was read the third time, and the bill being on its passage—

Mr. HARTLEY said: I have attended to the debates on this bill, and considered the subject, and am fully convinced that the bill should pass. By the act for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, the balances were assumed to be paid to the creditor States. The bill under consideration gives the alternative to the State (which shall be found a creditor) either to receive the balance herself and pay it to her citizens, or suffer them to fund their certificates with the General Government. I believe it will be found, on experience, most convenient to the creditor, and least expensive to the people, for the creditors to subscribe to a loan with the General Government. This, however, will rest in a great measure upon the individual States. Two taxes will be more expensive to collect than one; and if money is to go through two hands instead of one, in general it is attended with a double charge.

It is said, that the bill will offer a new field for speculation. It is possible that, to a certain degree, there may be weight in the observation; but after the experience we have had, the holders of certificates will not be easily imposed upon; and if the certificates of the individual States would be equalized, I am led to believe, that it would be of service to the community. They might, in a considerable degree, act as a medium in commerce, and in the transfer of property; but whilst they remain at different values, they will be mere objects of speculation. I regret exceedingly the great inequality of fortune, which has arisen among citizens, by the speculations in our paper; but in a great and mighty revolution, some partial evils must be expected, to obtain a general good. We are bound to pay our debts. I do not think that a large national debt is a blessing, but it is of high importance that the Government which is in debt should so dispose of it, as to do as little injury as possible, and if the same is practicable, produce a partial good.

In Pennsylvania our affairs appear to be in the highest state of prosperity; the farmer compensated for his labor; the mechanic everywhere fully employed and amply paid; commerce flourishing. Objections have been made against the law; yet I imagine if it is published, and the reasons for enacting it known, the public opinion of the State I represent, will be in favor of it. If we pass the act this session, we shall save the next Congress from much trouble and perplexity. We act now upon principle, without knowing how the balances will operate. If the creditor and debtor States were known, it would be found exceedingly difficult to reconcile the several interests. Remember the Representative bill; the Government had like to have been dissolved, on account of the various interests.

Much has been said about the interested motives of members. I may here say that I do not belong to that class called aristocrats, (if such there is among us.) I have always supported the rights of the people, according to the best of my judgment and abilities. I have almost in every instance received their approbation of my public conduct. In the present question I am not more interested than any other citizen; I have no certificates, I am no public creditor of any sort. I mean to act upon principle, and vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAGE, having moved the previous question, said that, in consequence of his aversion to waste the time of the House, which he always regarded as precious, he generally waited for the question, without troubling the House with his reasons for his vote, always satisfied if what occurred to him in support of it was offered by any other member, who might be better heard and understood—but that, when the names of the voters were to be held up to the public view, and when the vote he meant to give had been represented by some members, for whom he had the highest respect, as injurious to public creditors, as retrospective, and therefore unconstitutional in its operation, he thought himself bound to endeavor to justify his vote.

If the creditors, Mr. SPEAKER, who are the object of the bill before you, were, by the amendment, excluded from an application to their debtor, or were the General Government the only body to whom they could look for payment or common justice, I would most scrupulously avoid interfering with their claims; or, did the bill extend its influence to all the creditors of the States impartially, I might listen to some objections which have been made to a discrimination, said to be produced by the amendment. But, sir, granting all that has been objected to have its full force, I only find that such creditors of creditor States (for no others are to be benefited by this bill) as may not be able to establish their claims founded on a speculation, which was grounded on a supposition that this bill would pass, without the amendment now proposed, will only be left where they are, and where, in my opinion, they ought to be left—that is, to look to their original contract; and I do not contribute to seduce them from their attachment to their State, and from their reliance on its plighted faith. I wish not to see them deluded into an acceptance of four per cent. interest from the General Government of the United States, instead of six from their respective States, which I believe are willing and able to comply with their engagements. But, sir, if I were even an advocate for the assumption and for the complicated Funding System, I should vote for the amendment now proposed; because I think with my colleagues [Messrs. Madison and Giles] and the member from Maryland [Mr. MEXCE] that it is not only well calculated to prevent an improper scramble among speculators for the supposed benefit of the bill, but is proper to rescue the members of Congress from temptation, as well as from suspicion of speculating on their own laws. I therefore think, sir, I can honestly and conscientiously vote for the amendment.

Whilst I am up, (said Mr. P.) I will take the liberty of remarking that those gentlemen who so loudly and warmly replied to the member from Maryland, and supposed they were vindicating the honor of the House, in my opinion were greatly mistaken; their conduct tended to check free debate and bold investigation, and their remarks respecting newspaper information might be a dangerous check to the freedom of the press. What avails the declaration of our Constitution respecting the freedom of the press, if it may be restrained by the conduct of members in either House of Congress? And surely it may be restrained by such remarks as have been so warmly made by members here, merely on a member's stating information in his place, and referring to newspapers for further confirmation. Bold must be the printer, and on a broad basis of a large subscription must he stand, who can repeat information so severely quoted in this House. The honor of the House can never be vindicated by such expressions; on the contrary, they may lead our constituents to suppose that at least passions prevail here, and animosities exist, which ought to have no place among us; and, indeed, such conduct may tend directly to produce consequences of a serious nature to members concerned in debate.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that an amendment now incorporated in the bill has changed its principles altogether. It was contemplated by the original bill to provide for debts incurred only for the support of the war; but by this amendment, debts are to be subscribed to the loan which were created subsequent to the period in which those debts originated that have been hitherto called debts of the United States. Another amendment has been added, which postpones the subscription to a period so distant as to anticipate the proper business of a subsequent Legislature, which will be more competent to decide upon it than this House is. The gentleman who brought forward this motion, assigned as a reason, that by this postponement the Senate would have a control over the subject which they would not have without passing the bill, and with this amendment.

Mr. M. reproached the idea of controlling the deliberations of a subsequent Legislature. He said the ground of the bill was changed. The postponement of the subscriptions renders it entirely unnecessary for the present Congress to decide upon it. He was in favor, therefore, of postponing it, and of the previous question.

Mr. GRAY said he did not expect this opposition to the bill, at this stage of the business, especially from gentlemen who had advocated the very principle on which the bill is founded, viz: a provision for the balances which shall be found due on a final settlement of the accounts. The motion for the previous question is founded on the remonstrance of the State of Virginia; a State which justly has the reputation of being wise in her councils and decisions, but on the present occasion is single and alone in her conduct in regard to this subject. No other State has come forward with such a remonstrance against the act and doings of the National Legislature. He concluded, therefore, that in this instance at least, that State is in an error; especially as the grounds of her complaints have been obviated. He then adverted to the general provisions of the bill, and showed that they were perfectly consonant to the existing provisions made by former acts of the Government, respecting the balances which shall appear to be due to the several States. He alluded next to the several provisos and amendments of the bill which had been ingrafted in it, to accommodate it to the wishes of those who, notwithstanding, appeared to be as much opposed to it as ever. He was really surprised and confounded at the conduct of gentlemen in the Opposition. He noticed briefly the justice of the claims of the creditors; and concluded by observing that there were already sufficient difficulties to embarrass the operations of this Government, and he conceived that the opposition to measures calculated to doing justice in this particular case, was calculated to increase those difficulties and embarrassments.

Mr. AMES reproached the idea of putting the previous question. After a discussion of three weeks, it is now proposed to prevent a decision of the subject. He considered this as a very unfair and unjustifiable mode of procedure; such an one as the gentlemen in opposition to the bill, on mature reflection, would not themselves justify. He then noticed the scope of the arguments offered in support of the previous question, and urged a variety of considerations to show that the present was the most favorable time to decide the question. He deprecated the consequences of a postponement; it would be considered as a denial of justice on the part of the present Legislature, and as placing the creditors in the most uncertain situation as to their future fate; in short, he conceived it was such an evasion of justice as might put the country in a flame.

Mr. GILES replied to Mr. AMES. He conceived the consequences would be directly the reverse from those he had anticipated; he thought those who were to be benefited, who were comparatively but a small number, would not put the country in a flame: the danger was, that those who would suffer by the burdens which would result from the measure, would be thrown into a flame. He then entered into a general consideration of the subject, and urged a variety of reasons against the bill, and in favor of putting the previous question. Mr. G. also enlarged on the impropriety of precipitating the subject the present session.

Mr. WAITE said he had, last session, voted against the bill for assuming the State debts, but he should vote for the bill now under consideration. In this he thought he was perfectly consistent, as there was a radical difference between the two. The former was a proposition for assuming all the debts of all the States—the same which had been originally proposed at New York, and which he had uniformly opposed. The present is only for assuming to the amount of the balances which may be due to creditor States; this he always approved. He said he had heard but one argument against the propriety of coming to an immediate decision, which appeared to have any weight—that was, the unequal and imperfect representation. This, he said, was a circumstance which he felt as sensibly as any member of the House, and if the proposition was to impose burdens on the people, or to change an established system, he should hesitate before he agreed to it; but neither of these was the present case; no additional sums were to be raised by the bill, and no change made in the mode of payment of the balances without the approbation of the States to which they may be due.

Having thus obviated this objection, he said, he would give the reasons which induced him to believe the matter ought now to be decided. He observed that, perhaps, it might have been well had the subject not been brought forward, considering the opposition which had taken place. He did not, however, censure the gentleman who introduced it; that gentleman had, as well as himself, been acquainted with the proceedings respecting the assumption, from the commencement. And he declared he did not expect, when the resolutions were laid on the table, that an objection would be made to them; and it was probable as little apprehension was entertained by the mover of the resolutions; but he thought the manner in which the bill had been opposed, and in which it had been supported, required an immediate decision. It had been made the criterion of the public faith of the Government, and of the fidelity of its officers. Those who were in favor of the bill, alleged, as one reason in support of it, that when the balances were known, the debtor States would not agree to make provision for those balances, agreeably to the existing law. He believed that this suggestion was unfounded; he did not believe it was possible that any man, whom the confidence of his fellow-citizens should place on this floor, would ever refuse to carry that law into effect. He considered it as one of the pillars of the Constitution—a solemn compact between the United States and individual States—and he believed if ever this Government should be guilty of so gross a breach of faith, in a matter of importance sufficient to attract the general notice of the citizens, that there was an end to the Government itself. It was a Government founded on opinion; and when the opinion of the people ceased to support it, the Government must fall. On the other hand, the bill had not been opposed on its merits. No gentleman had attempted to point out the individual or the description of men who would be injured by the operation of the bill; they had opposed it wholly on collateral circumstances; they had supposed that if the States who had debts due to their citizens should have their balances discharged by assuming those debts, that they would oppose the payment of the balances to States which have no creditors. It had likewise been alleged, that the Commissioners for settling accounts might conduct themselves in such a manner as to render a legislative interposition necessary, to arrest the measures consequential on the settlement. He had no apprehension of such conduct on the part of the Commissioners, and could not legislate on a supposition that they would conduct themselves in a manner so very improper; but if they did, he could not see that the change in the payment of the balances could have any effect. If the Legislature could interfere where States were concerned, they might do the same in the case of individuals. But as jealousies had taken place in the minds of the members, and as both sides of the House seemed to consider the passing this bill as giving a greater force and stability to the act for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, it was a strong reason with him to give his assent to it. It had been said the passing the bill by so small a majority would occasion discontent and uneasiness among the people. This might be the case, but the same reason is equally applicable to a rejection of the bill by a small majority. But who are most likely to be dissatisfied? Those who by a rejection of the bill would feel themselves injured, at least disappointed in their expectations of advantage; or those who, notwithstanding its passage, would be left in their present condition? He believed, the former: so that as far as that argument had any weight, it was in favor of the bill.

Mr. MURRAY was in favor of the previous question. He thought the present stage of the business was the most proper to call for that question. It would, he said, have been justly exceptionable had the question been called previous to debate, but now it was strictly proper. Adverting to the merits of the bill, he objected to it as an infraction of the Funding System; that system provides for funding the balances in favor of the States, not the individual creditors. On this principle he considered the bill as establishing a dangerous precedent, and as affording a pretext for future infractions and mutilations of that system.

Mr. M., adverting to certain observations which had been thrown out respecting the uneasiness which was said to exist in some of the States, informed the House, that with respect to the State he had the honor to represent, the greatest apparent satisfaction with the measures of the General Government prevailed. It is true, said he, my constituents feel the pressure of taxes in common with the rest of their fellow-citizens, but they discover no disposition to complain; they consider the public burdens as the price of their liberties and independence, and, under this idea, submit to them with the utmost cheerfulness; at the same time confiding in the wisdom and justice of the Government that their impositions will be regulated according to the exigencies of the nation, and that no unnecessary taxes will ever be laid. He thought it necessary to say thus much, as he conceived too high a coloring had been given to some representations which the fancy of members had brought forward in their zealous opposition to the bill.

The previous question being called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, that the said bill do pass, be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 31, as follows:

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with an official statement of the expenditures to the end of the year 1792, from the sum of ten thousand dollars granted to defray the contingent expenses of Government, by an act passed on the 26th of March, 1790; also, an abstract of a supplementary arrangement made in the District of North Carolina, in regard to certain surveys, to facilitate the execution of the law laying a duty on distilled spirits.

The papers accompanying the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

HALF-PAY TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 18th instant, for making provision of half-pay for seven years to the widows and orphans of such officers of the Army of the United States as have been killed in the service since the third day of June, 1784, or who may hereafter be killed in the service of the United States.

Mr. HARTLEY, who brought forward the motion, moved to strike out June 3, 1784, and insert 4th day of March, 1789.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he should be in favor of the motion if it went as far back as the year 1775, and comprehended the widows and orphans of the officers of the Army killed within two years from the commencement of the war.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said he should consider it his duty to move for an amendment to the proposition, in the progress of its discussion, by inserting a clause to provide for the widows and orphans of the officers of the militia.

Mr. WADSWORTH stated the reasons on which he supposed provision had not been made for the widows and orphans of those officers which were killed during the period alluded to by the gentleman from New Hampshire: one principal one was, that the new Government was not authorized by the Constitution to create any demands against the United States; the Government was bound to take up the debts as they found them. The old Government had not recognised the claims of those widows and orphans alluded to. With respect to the present resolution, he was opposed to the amendment; he thought it ought to go back to June, 1784, the commencement of the present Indian war. He should move for other amendments to the resolution, that it should provide not only for those who may fall by the sword, but for such as die in the public service. He should also be for extending the provision to the widows and orphans of the officers of the militia. He considered it as a most disgraceful thing to a Government not to make provision for the families of those who sacrificed their lives in the cause of their country.

The motion for striking out June 3, 1784, was put and carried. The other part of the motion, to insert 4th day of March, 1789, was not put, being superseded by a motion for the Committee's rising. The Committee then rose, and reported progress.

TUESDAY, January 29.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of War on the petition of Thomas Wishart. Whereupon,

Resolved, That Thomas Wishart is entitled to the pay of a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States, from the 15th of November, 1776 until the 15th of October, 1781; and that the Comptroller of the Treasury be authorized to settle and adjust the account of the said Thomas Wishart accordingly.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pur-uant to the said resolution; and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. GORDON, and Mr. ASHE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. BENSON, from the Committee to whom was referred the petition of Robert Heaton, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill, together with the amendments thereto, was then read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the Useful Arts;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 30.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM HINDMAN, returned to serve in this House, for the State of Maryland, in the room of JOSHUA SENEY, who has resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions." Whereupon,

The amendments of the Senate to the bill to regulate claims to Invalid Pensions, were taken into consideration. Being read, it was moved that the bill should be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole.

This motion was objected to, as it would set the whole subject afloat, and might in its consequences preclude the Senate from an opportunity of receding from their amendments, and agreeing to the bill as it passed the House.

In answer to this objection, it was said, that the amendments involved an entire new principle, a principle which had not been discussed in the House; and that is, they make distinction in the situation of those invalids whose cases have been decided on by the Secretary of War, and that of the persons whose claims have been examined by the judges. The cases of the latter are not recognized by the amendments.

The motion for recommitting was carried in the affirmative, and the subject made the order of the day for to-morrow.

PROMOTION OF THE USEFUL ARTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts."

The motion offered by Mr. WHITE, the purport of which is to amend the first section by striking out what relates to the Director of the Mint, and inserting a clause which provides for the appointment of an officer to be denominated "the Director of Patents," was further considered.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the form of the amendment as indirectly providing for a new establishment.

Mr. WHITE withdrew his motion, and offered the following, in substance, in lieu of it:

"That an office shall be established for the purpose of granting patents, vesting in the authors of useful inventions and discoveries the exclusive right to their inventions and discoveries: said office to be under the direction of an officer to be denominated _____."

Mr. LIVERMORE said he liked this motion, because it brought the subject directly before the Committee. This object, however, he disliked; it sounded like a provision for granting _____ dollars per annum—a sound which he was always averse to. He was altogether in favor of devolving the business on some officer already appointed: the Secretary of State he mentioned as a proper officer to superintend this subject.

Mr. PAGE said he should not agree to the amendment if he thought a salary would be the consequence. He supposed that provision might be made for the officer without recurring to a salary: he alluded to fees from the patentees. He objected to devolving the subject on the officer of the Mint, or of the Secretary of State, as interfering with the essential duties of those officers; and, though the gentlemen at present in those offices are abundantly qualified to execute the duty, yet it may happen that persons may hold those appointments at some future time not qualified for this particular service.

Mr. MURRAY observed that the amendment contemplated the appointment of one officer only, and that to be fixed at the seat of Government. He suggested several considerations in favor of investing the Judges of the District Courts with the power of granting patents in the several States, and the greater accommodation of the citizens, and the more extensive encouragement of genius. He was in favor of giving greater facility to the issuing of patents than has hitherto been considered as advisable.

Mr. WHITE said he thought the gentleman's idea would not do, as patents might be issued in the different parts or extremes of the Union for the same invention.

Mr. MURRAY said that he conceived a remedy for this inconvenience might easily be devised.

Mr. BOURNOR said that one great objection to the present mode of obtaining patents was, the great delay and expense incurred by the applicants in being obliged to wait till the officers now empowered to decide on applications could find leisure, from the special duties of their offices, to attend to them. With respect to devolving the duty on the judges, he hoped that would not be done; as it would be found, judging from the engagements of the District Judge of Pennsylvania, that they could not possibly attend to the business.

Promotion of the Useful Arts.

Mr. BALDWIN objected generally to any amendment which should provide for the institution of a new department. His opinion was, that no office should be created till there was an absolute necessity for it. He entered into a brief consideration of the subject, and attempted to show that the business might with ease and convenience be attended to by some officer already appointed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, advertising to the principles of the bill, said it was an imitation of the Patent System of Great Britain; that the provisions were such as would circumscribe the duties of the department of disputes arising from contested claims will devolve on referees altogether. He was decidedly opposed to creating a new Department—expense to the Government would be the inevitable consequence. The question on Mr. WHITE's motion was negatived.

Mr. MURRAY said, he intended to move to strike out "Director of the Mint," for the purpose of inserting "the Judge of the District wherein the applicant might reside." As he thought the bill of great consequence as it related to the useful and ornamental arts, he would trouble the Committee with his reasons. He thought it was of consequence that, while the law holds out an invitation to genius, the mode of gratifying the fair and honest inventor should be as easy as possible. The Director of the Mint must reside at the Seat of Government; and, if he alone, or any other person, were exclusively empowered to issue patents, the benefits of invention would be but very partially enjoyed by the citizens who reside at a distance from the Seat of Government. The law ought to facilitate the granting of patents; and, as the right of exclusive enjoyment, at least for a limited term, was inherent in all equally, in every part of the nation, so all should, as far as possible, have equal facility in making their pretensions known and effectual. A country in Europe (Great Britain) had afforded, it was true, much experience on the subject; but regulations adopted there would not exactly comport in all respects either with the situation of this country, or with the rights of the citizen here. The minds of some members had taken a wrong direction, he conceived, from the view in which they had taken up the subject under its analogy with the doctrine of patents in England. There is this strong feature which distinguishes that doctrine in that country from the principles on which we must settle it in this. These patents are derived from the grace of the Monarch, and the exclusive enjoyment of the profits of a discovery is not so much a right inherent as it is a privilege bestowed and an emanation of prerogative. Here, on the contrary, the citizen has a right in the inventions he may make, and considers the law but as the mode by which he is to enjoy their fruits. England is one entire kingdom. Its Court is the scene where its prerogative diffuses its bounties, and, being stationed at London, the business can be well managed in a single spot. Here, on the contrary, there are fifteen States, sovereign as to many purposes, and forming within themselves centres of attraction for the ingenious and aspiring. London, in that country, not only attracts as the mart of genius and of all that contributes to ease or gain, but, by its immense combination of things, aids invention, and draws the genius into action which it may have attracted. But we are differently circumstanced, both as to local situation, and as to the thing as it regards the principle on which it is to be obtained. The distance from the extremes of the Union, or from its centre to its extremes, is very great. If the power were lodged with the District Judges, the citizen of ingenuity would have an opportunity of taking a patent certainly with more ease than if you oblige him to take a journey of perhaps six or eight hundred miles. The facility of enjoyment would prove an incentive to invention. Difficulty and distance would discourage it, and would frequently overpower the wish to obtain a patent for a discovery the profits of which would often be doubtful.

One and but one objection had been made to this alteration: that if the District Judges have the power, patents may issue in different places for the same discovery. This would be an evil, but is not without a remedy. Patents are matters of record. Let it be the duty of the Judge, immediately after the granting of a patent, to transmit a copy of the application, with all the necessary description of the article, to the Supreme Court, from which it may be easily disseminated to every District Court, and through the United States. An inventor desirous of obtaining a patent, would, of course, examine the patent records to see whether he had been anticipated. The grant of a patent does not destroy a claim or right founded in priority. Here he would observe, that, if the inconvenience were not entirely removed by this measure which he proposed, neither was the inconvenience of conflicting claims as to originality and priority of discovery removed by any provision of the bill as it stands; nor could human ingenuity, perhaps, devise a complete mode in which it could be obviated. If a man who is really the inventor, chooses to try his title as to the originality of the invention, even after a patent is given to another, he will make and vend the article, and the solid title will be tried before a jury in an action brought against him by the patentee. If the measure he proposed were not deemed a sufficient guard, he would suggest the propriety of a further caution: Let the application be published and remain in the office, as in England it does (he believed) two months in the office of the Attorney General, that a caveat may be entered by any man who might claim or dispute the applicant's title.

He believed that the bill, either as it tended to foster the genius of men, or was considered with respect to distant emolument and national character, was extremely important. It was almost immediately one of those laws that embraced national views and national citizenship, and looked to an object of advantage which nothing but a National Government could secure. Without the aid of a General Government, the genius of the Americans could not reap its fruits. Nor had the State Governments given a fair occasion for the display of the ingenuity which he believed existed in the country. As to this great object, which requires national citizenship, the State laws were impotent. He thought that it was of consequence that no invention, however small or irrelative it might at first appear, should be lost; and, where he saw the idea of a patent law ridiculed by some, and unattended to by others, he believed they were accustomed to take things in their appearances, and had not exerted their reflection. A little reflection would teach us that whatever is great and astonishing in the works of art was humble in its origin, had been opposed by ignorance or cramped by poverty, and had become important but by gradual accumulation and a very slow progression; and that the wisdom of Government should be exerted in forming a repository, where nothing that might eventually be of service should be suffered to perish. He therefore wished to see such a law as would not only secure what might be offered near the Seat of Government, but invite and draw forth the useful invention of those who lived at a distance. That it should present an easy method of granting its protection, he therefore moved, that the Judge of the District wherein the applicant may reside, should be substituted for Director of the Mint.

Mr. WILLIAMSON offered a few objections to this motion, the question on which was taken, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. SENOWICK, "Director of the Mint" was stricken out, and "Secretary of State" inserted.

Mr. WHITE moved an amendment by way of proviso, the purport of which is, to preclude the inventor of an improvement to a machine from using the original invention, or the author of the original machine from using the improvement. This motion, after some opposition, was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved an amendment to the second section, which provides that the requisite oath or affirmation may be taken before any Judge of the United States, or of any particular State, or any person authorized to administer an oath in the place where the applicant resides. Agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON proposed another amendment, which should vest a discretionary power in the officer to dispense with the production of a model when he should think proper. Agreed to.

The Committee proceeded in the discussion of the bill as far as the seventh section; they then rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 31.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," with an amendment to the last amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Secretary also brought to the House a Letter, received and read in the Senate, from Monsieur Le Brun, heretofore Royal Commissioner at the Tribunal of the District of Constances, in France, addressed to the Congress of the United States, stating the delay of payment of a debt due to the heirs of Jerom Michael Le Brun, late an officer in Armand's Legion, for services in the United States during the late war.

A petition of Brown & Francis, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, merchants, was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed the amount of the drawback on a quantity of gin and codfish, exported from the port of Providence, and duly landed at Calcutta, in the East Indies, and St. Eustatia, in the years 1791 and 1792, of which they are possessed of sufficient evidence, although not in the form prescribed by law.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. GROVE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to reimburse Henry Emanuel Luterloh for expenses incurred in coming to America to join the Army of the United States; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the account of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States; which was received, and read twice and committed.

PROMOTION OF THE USEFUL ARTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts."

The seventh section was read; some amendments were proposed, but disagreed to.

A motion was made to strike out the 8th section, for the purpose substituting another, which should provide, that all interfering claims for patents, should be determined at the option of the parties, either by the Secretary of State, or by arbitrators, &c. This motion gave rise to debate. It was at length moved to amend the motion, by striking out all the words after "Secretary of State," this motion was not agreed to. Various other amendments to the motion were moved, and last, it was finally agreed to the following modification: That interfering applications for patents shall be determined by the Secretary of State; or, if all parties require it, by arbitrators, &c.

The motion for striking out the 8th section, and inserting the amendment, was put, and agreed to.

The Committee finished the discussion of the bill; they then rose and reported the same with amendments, which were laid on the table.

FRIDAY, February 1.

The Letter from Monsieur Le Brun, communicated in a message from the Senate yesterday, was read, and ordered to be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and make report thereupon to the House.

[FEBRUARY, 1793.]

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senate to the last amendment of this House to the bill entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment to the amendment.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to some and disagreement to others of the said amendments. The House proceeded to consider the said report and amendments: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendments to the first and second sections; and doth disagree to the amendments to the fourth and fifth sections of the said bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," and, the same being read, were agreed to. And then, the said bill being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

A petition of James Montgomery, master and commander of the revenue cutter called the General Greene, in behalf of himself and the officers of the said cutter, was presented to the House and read, praying that the compensation allowed by law to the officers and crews of revenue cutters may be augmented, and rendered more adequate to their services.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial and petition of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, in Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as allows a drawback on foreign cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, may be repealed, and the duties imposed on said articles increased; and that the duty on hemp, when manufactured within the United States, and exported therefrom, may be refunded to the exporter.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 22d ultimo, the memorial of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, and packthread, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

PROMOTION OF THE USEFUL ARTS.

The amendments to the bill to amend the act, entitled an act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, were taken into consideration; some amendments being made to these amendments, the whole were agreed to; additional amendments were proposed; among others,

Mr. MURRAY moved to add the words "being citizen or citizens of the United States," after the words person or persons; the object of which is, to prevent foreigners from obtaining patents in this country for inventions which they have already obtained patents for in Europe; by which means the citizens of the United States might be prevented from obtaining patents for the same, or similar inventions.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. KIRTELL moved to reduce the period for which patents should be granted, from fourteen to ten years; this motion was negatived. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

MONDAY, February 4.

An engrossed bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Alexander Contee Hanson, which was made on the 30th of April last: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Accounting Officers of the Treasury be authorized to liquidate and pay the account of Alexander Contee Hanson, for traveling expenses and attendance at New York as one of the Judges appointed by the General Government to determine a controversy between the States of South Carolina and Georgia, which was, without his knowledge, compromised; and that the allowance be the same as that provided by law for the traveling expenses and attendance of the present members of Congress.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. MERRICK, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. STURGES, do prepare and bring in the same.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a report, and sundry statements marked A, B, C, D, E, and F, made in pursuance of the resolutions of this House of the 23d ultimo; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election, and to regulate the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. LAURANCE, be of the said committee on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to repeal part of a resolution of Congress of the 29th of August, 1793, respecting the inhabitants of Post St. Vincents; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. And then, the said bill being amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendment, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the UNITED STATES, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. BARNWELL, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," which lay on the table: Whereupon, the said bill, together with the amendment agreed to yesterday, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 7, as follows:

YEA.—Fisher Ames, John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjehub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Daniel Hugler, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, George Leonard, Nathaniel Macon, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Alexander D. Orr, John Page, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, Hugh Williams, and Francis Willis.

YEA.—Samuel Livermore, John Francis Mercer, Nathaniel Niles, Josiah Parker, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, and Thomas Tredwell.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows: Resolved, That the remission of duties on a quantity of salt and wines entered at the port of New York, which, together with the ship, was lost on the passage from thence to Philadelphia, in March last, ought to be granted, agreeable to the prayer of the petitioners.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. KEY, Mr. GROVE, and Mr. TUCKER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MERCER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to make compensation to Alexander Contee Hanson; which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 18th ultimo, for making provision of half-pay for seven years, to the widows and orphans of certain officers of the Army of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. KEY reported that the Committee had, according to order, had the said motion under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision of half-pay for years to the widows and orphans of such officers of the Army of the United States, as have been killed in the service, since the fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, or who may hereafter be killed in the service of the United States, ought to be made by law.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. GREENUP, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate, informed the House, that the Senate disagree to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States, as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States." The Senate also insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the fourth and fifth sections of the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference, the Senate have appointed managers on their part: The Senate have also agreed to the amendment, proposed by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters." The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled 'An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.'" The House proceeded to consider so much of the said message, as desires a conference on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate claims to Invalid Pensions." Whereupon.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said conference, and that Mr. SEBASTIAN, Mr. GILLES, and Mr. BURNETT, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to reimburse Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, for expenses incurred in coming to America, to join the Army of the United States during late war; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. HARTLEY, from the Committee appointed presented a bill to make provision of half-pay to the widows and orphans of certain officers; which was received, read twice and committed.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the adjustment of a claim of Joseph Henderson, against the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

A memorial of the officers of the Rhode Island line of the late American Army, in behalf themselves and the soldiers of said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debt granted them for military services during the late war, may be made good, or such other relief afforded them, as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

A petition of John Rogers was presented to the House and read praying compensation for certain lands on the Mississippi river, granted him by the State of Virginia, for his services as an officer in the line of the said State, prior to the cession made to the United States, of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio; the title to which lands has since been ceded to the Chickasaw Indians, by the treaty of Hopewell, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. PAGE, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. CLARK; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House. An engrossed bill to repeal part of a resolution of Congress of the twenty-ninth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, respecting the inhabitants of Post Saint Vincents, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States, was read the third time and passed. An engrossed bill to reimburse Henry Emanuel Lutterloh for expenses incurred in coming to America, to join the Army of the United States, during the late war, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the adjustment of a claim of Joseph Henderson against the United States, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill providing compensation to the President and Vice-President of the UNITED STATES, which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of War, to whom was referred the petition of Simeon Thayer; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported, that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That Simeon Thayer, late a Major in the Army of the United States, who was disabled at the battle of Monmouth, be placed on the pension list of the United States; that he be allowed the half-pay of a Major, from the first of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, provided he return his commutation of half-pay, with interest thereon.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. GILMAN, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Elijah Bostwick: Whereupon,

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid to the said Elijah Bostwick, the sum of fifty-eight pounds, three shillings and four pence, current money of New York, being the amount of costs which he incurred in defending a suit commenced against him, as agent to the deputy Commissary General of the Northern Department, on public account.

Ordered, That a bill be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SYLVESTER, Mr. KEY, and Mr. GROVE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the engrossed bill to compensate John Tucker; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time, immediately. An engrossed bill to compensate John Tucker, was read the third time; and, on the question that the said bill pass, it passed in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

Mr. GREENUP's resolution for placing on the pension list all such officers and privates of the militia as are or may be wounded in the service, and who are not provided for by law, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The resolution was read by the Chairman.

Mr. GREENUP supported this resolution by observing that, as the militia was now called into service by the General Government, it was reasonable to make provision for such as may be wounded or disabled. Except this was done, he conceived that the United States would find it extremely difficult to procure an effective militia force on any occasion. Indeed, it was to be imputed to this cause that the militia had hitherto discovered so great a backwardness in turning out; and that those who had been in service were so indifferent, being principally substitutes. He added some remarks on the justice and good policy of making the provision; nor did he conceive that the increase of the pension list was a sufficient reason to prevent making that provision, when it is considered how important a subject is a competent defence to our frontiers.

Several gentlemen objected to the resolution as involving a very great and increasing expense. The increase of the pension list, it was said, ought not to be thought lightly of in a republican Government. It was said that, in the Militia law, the object of the resolution was in a great measure provided for; it does not, indeed, look back; but provision for particular persons may be made without going to an unlimited retrospective view of the case. The resolution was modified to refer to such officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the militia as have been wounded or disabled since the — day of —, or who shall hereafter be wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

The debate was continued to a considerable length, in which the difference between the militia and the regular troops was stated. The latter, it was said, abandon every other pursuit and occupation when they engage in the service; and, in cases of wounds and disabilities incurred in the public service, are left absolutely without any other resource than the provision made for them by the public as pensioners. With respect to the militia, they are commonly persons of property, who leave their respective occupations for a time, and when the service is performed they have their farms and their various occupations to return to. It was said that it would be unspeakably better to pay the militia at an enhanced rate—such a rate as may be sufficient to induce them to turn out. That extending the system of pensions in the manner contemplated, would render the matter complex, extensive, and enormously expensive—while at the same time it would subject the public to innumerable impositions.

A motion was made that the Committee should rise, and that the resolution should be referred to the committee which reported the bill providing half-pay to the widows and orphans of the officers of the regular troops. After further debate, this motion was put and negatived.

The question on agreeing to the resolution, as modified, was then put and agreed to.

Mr. BARNWELL moved an additional resolution, which was agreed to; the purport of which was to regulate the mode of ascertaining the nature and degree of the disabilities, and the annual allowance to be granted for the same. The Committee then rose and reported the two resolutions to the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for placing such officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of the militia, as have been disabled in the service of the United States, since the — day of —, or shall hereafter be disabled in such service, on the pension list.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for establishing such regulations as may be necessary to ascertain the nature and degree of such disabilities, and the annual allowance to be made for the same."

The House adopted the resolutions, and referred them to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill.

THURSDAY, February 7.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, of the fifth instant, for the appointment of a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected, of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President; and have appointed a committee for that purpose on their part.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee to whom were referred the memorials of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, of Philadelphia and Providence, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing compensation to the President and Vice President of the UNITED STATES; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House. And then a motion being made and seconded further to amend the said bill at the Clerk's table, by adding to the end thereof the following section, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for, and during the term of, four years, from the third day of March next, and no longer."

It passed in the negative—yeas 27, nays 33, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. Key, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the remission of the duty on a quantity of wines, the property of Woodrop and Joseph Sims; which was received, and read twice and committed.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Simeon Thayer; which was received, read twice and committed.

Mr. Key, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to refund to Jacob Ball certain duties on pickled fish; which was twice read and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Robert Heaton; Whereupon, That it is advisable that the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on horses, and other useful beasts imported into the United States for breed, be repealed.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. BENSON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. MADISON, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the sixteenth of April last, the petition of the inhabitants of Newark, in New Jersey; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had the said report under consideration, and come to no resolution thereupon.

FRIDAY, February 8

An engrossed bill providing compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SYLVESTER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Elijah Bostwick; which was read twice and committed.

A memorial of the officers of the late American Army, now residing in the State of South Carolina, in behalf of themselves, and the non-commissioned officers and privates of the said Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the debt granted them for military services during the late war, may be made good, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie.

A memorial of the merchants and inhabitants of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences under which they labor from the number of sick and disabled seamen that daily frequent that port, and praying that a tax may be imposed on all vessels or seamen, for the purpose of establishing, in or near the seaport towns of the United States, marine hospitals, for the reception and support of sick and disabled seamen; or that such other regulations may be adopted, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill for the relief of sick and infirm seamen.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to make provision of half-pay to the widows and orphans of certain officers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment; and the same being read, was agreed to.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to establish fees in the Treasury Department, for the transfer of public securities, and that Mr. CLARK, Mr. FINDLEY, and GERRY, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the remission of the duty on a quantity of wines, the property of Woodrop and Joseph Sims; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. And, on the question that the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time, it passed in the negative; and so the said bill was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the bill, entitled "An act for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina." The Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

SATURDAY, February 9.

A petition of the French inhabitants of Gallopolis was presented to the House and read, praying that the title to certain lands in the territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, which they purchased from the agent of the Scioto Company, in 1790, may be confirmed to them.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. BARNWELL; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of the officers of the Georgia line of the late Army of the United States, on behalf of themselves and the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debt granted them for military services, during the late war, may be made good, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit. Laid on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, of Philadelphia and Providence; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report; and, on the question, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the same; it passed in the affirmative; and so the said memorial was rejected.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish fees to be paid on the transfer of public securities; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and regulating the same," made a report; and, the same being read, the House proceeded to consider the said report and amendments: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services rendered during the late war."

MONDAY, February 11.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Simeon Thayer was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Postmaster General, respecting a tax imposed on the proprietors of the lines of stages, by a late law of the State of New Jersey; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session, for the regulation of the Post Office.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on so much of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made the third of December last, as relates to a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt. The Report being read:

Mr. GILES adverted to the imperfect state of the information before the House, relative to the state of the funds, particularly as the resolutions calling for this information had not yet been completed with, and he was apprehensive the requisite statements would not be furnished during the present session; this being the state of things, he thought the Committee were not in a situation to go into a discussion of the subjects of the new loans and new taxes, without further light; he moved therefore that the Committee should rise. This motion was seconded.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was opposed to the motion. After briefly stating the importance of the subject, the general expectation of the people that something would be done the present session relative to a provision for reducing the Public Debt, the duty of the Government to avail itself of the right reserved to it of paying off a part of the Debt, the state of the Treasury, the material information already received from the Secretary, the actual surplus in the Treasury, &c., concluded by saying, that he hoped the Committee would not rise, but go into a discussion of the subject, take up the propositions offered by the Secretary, and adopt or reject them, as their merits shall dictate, or agree to others which may be brought forward by any member of the Committee.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, alluding to the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, respecting this particular object, and the answer of the House thereto, gave a short account of the progress of the business in the House; it had been neglected ever since the 30th November, though the Secretary's Report has been in its possession ever since that period.

For the Committee then to rise, would be tantamount to a relinquishment of the object of the present session. He stated several particulars to show that it was probable the existing funds would be adequate to the object in some degree, without being obliged to have recourse to new taxes. He said, that he had been informed a gentleman of the Committee had prepared some resolutions relative to the subject; he hoped, therefore, that the Committee would not rise, but that the gentleman would produce his resolutions; that the Committee would take them into consideration, and at least take such steps in the matter as would manifest some disposition to meet the wishes of the people, and justify the professions made by so great a number of the members of the Legislature.

Mr. GILES repeated his objections, arising from the imperfect state of the information before the House; advising to the PRESIDENT'S Speech, he said, the propositions before the Committee were in direct opposition to the Speech. The Speech does not contemplate any new taxes, but the reverse. The propositions directly propose to go into measures for a reduction of the Debt; it was an object he much desired; but he called on gentlemen to show how this could be done with any propriety, when the most important and most necessary information respecting the funds is not in their possession.

Mr. LAURANCE adverted to the resolutions brought forward a few days since by Mr. GILES; and going over them one by one, he asked what connexion the present subject had with a solution of the principal part of the inquiries contained in those resolutions? The most important information expected from the requisitions contained in the resolutions, he observed, was in the possession of the House, particularly that which had any bearing on the present matter. He was opposed to the motion for the Committee's rising.

Mr. MERCER said, he saw no good end that would result from the Committee's rising. Had he the least suspicion that the project of the Secretary of the Treasury would be adopted, he would be one of the last that would rise in support of a motion to go into the discussion at the present time; but he had no such expectation. He then entered into a consideration of the documents before the House, received from the Secretary of the Treasury; he observed they were inaccurate, defective, and imperfect; they do not furnish the requisite information as to the expenditures of the public money, which have been already paid by the people. He showed the impropriety of laying any new taxes until satisfaction was had relative to the sums already paid; the people would not consider their interest consulted until this was done. He then urged several reasons in favor of a postponement of a permanent provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, till a more competent representation was on the floor; that it was extremely improper for the requisites of an imperfect representation at the close of the session to go into the consideration of so important business. He professed his wishes that provision should be made for the reduction of the Public Debt, and concluded by suggesting, that a temporary provision only be made the present session; further than this, he thought, it would be improper to go in the present state of affairs.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, that the gentleman last speaking furnished him with an opportunity to suggest to the consideration of the Committee some ideas he had revolved in his own mind respecting a temporary provision. He then pointed out resources within the control of the Legislature that might be applied to this object, without recurring to new taxes, specifying the sum that would be wanted to begin the operation; he mentioned a particular surplus, and the Bank dividend as being adequate to the object.

Mr. CLARK said, he wanted information as well as the gentleman from Virginia; but he saw no use in the Committee's rising; they would get up where they sat down, if they should now rise. He wished the propositions which had been mentioned were brought forward, that they might be considered; but there was another subject which he thought had a prior claim to attention, and that was the debt due the Bank: in December that business was pushed with great zeal; since that time nothing had been said about it; this appeared mysterious.

Mr. LAURANCE rose to explain the state of the matter respecting the debt due to the Bank. The subject had been suspended, in order that the House might receive complete information as to the state of the public funds.

Mr. PAGE offered some general remarks on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he said, were considered by many persons as exceptionable in all its parts. He had his objections to it. He wished the whole subject to revert to the consideration of the Legislature, and had therefore seconded the motion for the Committee to rise, as the most delicate mode of giving the subject the go by.

Mr. MADISON defended an observation brought forward by Mr. GILES, which was, that there was a manifest impropriety in bringing forward abstract propositions for discussion, when it was not known what consequences were involved in the adoption of those propositions. Mr. MADISON stated a variety of particulars to show that such abstract propositions are improper. He professed his wishes that some provision should be made for reducing the debt; he believed his colleague was sincere in his professions to the same purpose. He recapitulated some of the objections arising from the imperfect state of the information before the House.

Mr. GILES withdrew his motion; his object in doing so was to give an opportunity for bringing forward the propositions which had been alluded to.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, after offering some remarks in answer to observations which had been made, tending to impeach his consistency and sincerity in the present case, read two propositions, the purport of which is, that an annual fund be constituted, to consist of one hundred and three thousand one hundred and ninety-nine dollars and six cents, to begin to accrue the first day of January, 1793; and that a loan to the amount of five hundred and fifty thousand dollars be made.

These being read by the Chairman, Mr. GILES renewed his motion for the Committee to rise.

Examining Votes for President, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MADISON objected to these resolutions, as being abstract propositions.

Mr. VENABLE objected to them; he informed the Committee that in the course of the discussion he should move to apply the Sinking Fund to the object now under consideration.

Mr. MERCER objected to diverting the Sinking Fund from its appropriate object.

The Committee then rose and reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

EXAMINING VOTES FOR PRESIDENT, &c.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly, with a committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and for other purposes expressed in the resolution of the fifth instant, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock: That two persons be appointed tellers on the part of this House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared: that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to both Houses, assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journal of the two Houses."

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. LAURANCE, be appointed tellers on the part of this House, pursuant to the said report.

TUESDAY, February 12.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for repealing the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for remitting the duties heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid; which was twice read and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of Elijah Bostwick; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the Joint Committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and for the other purposes expressed in the resolution of the fifth instant, and have appointed a teller on their part, pursuant to the said report.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on so much of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made the third of December last, as relates to a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Elijah Bostwick was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to refund to Jacob Bell certain duties on pickled fish; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to make compensation to Alexander Contee Hanson; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And on the question, that the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative; and so the said bill was rejected.

VOTES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a PRESIDENT of the Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates, and counting the votes of the several States, in the choice of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to attend, with this House, on that occasion.

Resolved, That the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the said message.

The SPEAKER accordingly left the Chair, and, attended by the House, withdrew to the Senate Chamber, and, after some time, returned to the House.

The SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH and Mr. LAURANCE then delivered in, at the Clerk's table, a list of the votes of the Electors of the several States, in the choice of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of this House; which was ordered to be entered on the Journal, and is as follows:

The SPEAKER laid before the House two Letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, the first accompanying copies of certain powers, instructions, statements, and correspondence in relation to foreign loans, transmitted pursuant to the resolutions of this House, of the 23d ultimo; the second of the said Letters, accompanying three several statements in relation to the Sinking Fund, and two other statements of cash in the Treasury during the years 1791 and 1792, also transmitted in pursuance of the said resolutions; which were partly read.

THURSDAY, February 14.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions of the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,' to which they desire the concurrence of this House; also, that the Senate have agreed to a resolution for the appointment of a committee, jointly, with a committee on the part of this House, to wait on the President, and to notify to him of his unanimous re-election to the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and for other purposes expressed in the resolution of the 5th instant, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President, and to notify him of his unanimous re-election to the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. LAURANCE, be of the said committee, on the part of this House.

The House resumed the reading of the Letters and statements communicated from the Secretary of the Treasury, yesterday, and made further progress therein.

FRIDAY, February 15.

An engrossed bill to refund to Jacob Bell certain duties on pickled fish, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry printers and booksellers of the city of Philadelphia, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill for repealing the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for remitting the duties heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid.

Mr. GREENUP, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for placing on the pension list such officers and privates of the militia as may be wounded and disabled in the service of the United States; which was read the third time, and committed.

Ordered, That the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" be committed to Messrs. GOODRUE, HINDMAN, and JEREMIAH SMITH.

The House resumed the reading of the Letters and statements communicated from the Secretary of the Treasury, on Wednesday last, and went through the same.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,'" reported several amendments thereto; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Transfer of Public Securities.

[H. or R.]

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommitteed, on the 14th of November last, the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, made a revisionary report; which was read, and, together with the first report, ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose, with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President, and to notify him of his unanimous re-election to the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, reported that the committee had performed that duty.

SATURDAY, February 16.

TRANSFER OF PUBLIC SECURITIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to establish fees to be paid on the transfer of public securities.

The bill was read by the Chairman. An amendment was proposed, which was, to strike out the last line of the bill, and to substitute a clause providing for the disposal of the fees, which are to be received by the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Loan Offices.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he did not know whether he should vote for the bill or not. At present he had his doubts on the expediency of departing from a principle established in the Government, which is, that public officers should be compensated for their services without being authorized to receive any fees. This principle has been adhered to in all cases where it was practicable; and it must appear the most eligible mode, when it is considered how difficult it is to guard against abuses and frauds. He considered it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to provide adequate checks.

Mr. BENSON objected to the provision, generally. He considered it as laying a tax on a particular species of property already encumbered with various restrictions, in respect to which there is no option left to one of the parties. The Government has prescribed for its own security a particular process in the subject of transferring public certificates. He saw no reason in imposing a tax in addition to these regulations.

Mr. DAYTON (in replying to Mr. FITZSIMONS) observed, that the process of making the transfers, at the several Loan Offices, would afford an opportunity to provide complete and adequate checks against any abuse in the transaction, or embezzlement of the fees; the names of the parties are always entered in books kept for the purpose, and these would furnish the necessary criterions. With respect to the objection arising from the provision's operating as a tax, he conceived it did not apply with any greater force than what might be urged against fees imposed on deeds, &c. Mr. D. conceived that, as a host of clerks were employed in the Treasury Department on this business of transfer, which was done for the benefit of individuals, he thought it no more than reasonable that they should pay the expense.

Mr. CLARK followed Mr. DAYTON in a train of similar observations. He said he saw no difficulty in the case; the expense will fall on the speculators only.

Mr. STURGES said, it appeared to him that the bill would operate as an infraction of the law making provision for the Public Debt. He conceived that that law does not contemplate any charge being paid by the proprietors of public securities for transferring the certificates; they never supposed that they would be clogged with any such charge. In this view of the subject, he should be opposed to the bill.

Mr. BENSON replied to Mr. DAYTON's remarks on the tax imposed on deeds; he said the cases are not parallel. In the present case, there is no option to the public creditors; the Government has already prescribed how this business shall be done; it must therefore be considered as a breach of the rights of the creditors. With respect to the expenses falling exclusively on speculators, he said the gentleman was mistaken, and mentioned an instance to show that persons who are not speculators will be subject to the tax. Mr. B. doubted the propriety, however, of a regulation which should operate so partially. He very much doubted the legality of framing a tax that should be pointed at any class of citizens in particular.

Mr. MENCER, after a few introductory remarks on the general utility of public institutions, and the obligation which every citizen is under to support them, remarked, that however true this principle is, yet it is but just that those who derive peculiar personal advantages from these institutions, should pay for those advantages. He applied this reasoning to the case in hand, and observed, that on this principle he thought the provision contemplated by the bill was reasonable and just. With respect to taxing the property in the funds, he remarked, that the subject involved the most extensive considerations. He should not at present enter into a discussion of them; but he observed, that it was clearly his opinion that that species of property was liable to taxation in common with every other; and this idea he said was sanctioned by the usages and customs of nations.

Mr. BARNWELL said, it appeared to him that the particular regulation established in the Treasury Department was made for the public advantage; if so, he could not see the justice of throwing the expense on individuals. If the bill should be sustained, he contended that the individuals should have the alternative of transferring or not, as is the case in respect to deeds. He should therefore be opposed to the bill, unless some provision for an alternative should accompany it.

Fees in the Transfers of Public Securities.

Mr. GERRY objected to the bill on general principles. He stated sundry consequences extremely injurious to the public credit, which might be grafted on the principle contained in the regulation proposed.

Mr. BOUNDINOT observed, that when the proposition was first brought forward, he entertained a favorable idea of the provision; he had not, however, till this morning, critically examined the operation of the principle in relation to the contract between the Government and the public creditors. He was indebted, he said, to the gentleman from New York, for the idea of an interference. Mr. B. then analyzed the provision respecting the Public Debt, in order to show that the regulations adopted were considered as final and conclusive; full and complete provision was made to defray the expense by the Government; from hence he deduced this consequence, that the tax contemplated would have a retrospective aspect—would interfere with the stipulations of the contract, and go to injuring the public credit essentially; for, said he, if Congress can lay a tax on the transfer of the public securities, they may extend the principle to such a degree as to interdict all transfers whatever, yea, to taxing the Debt; an idea he conceived totally subversive of public credit.

Mr. DAYTON remarked, that the reasoning of his colleague, and of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GERRY,] went too far; it would apply to every species of imposition whatever; and the Government would thereby be in effect precluded from laying any duties on impost and tonnage.

Mr. S. BOURNE was in favor of the bill. He cited precedents from Probate and other offices in the several States, to show that paying fees was customary, and was submitted to by the people. The parties deriving the benefit, it is universally conceived, should bear the expense incurred. With respect to the fees, he conceived the precedent is already established by the Government; fees are paid in the Department of State, these fees are accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury. He thought a similar mode might be adopted in the present case. Let the fees be paid for the benefit of the United States, and let the several officers account with the head of the Treasury Department for the same; who will account to the Legislature.

Mr. CLARK supported the bill by further remarks. He extended his ideas to taxing the public securities: this expedient, he said, the public exigencies may possibly require. He repeated his observations relative to the number of clerks in the Treasury, employed on the business of transfers: the great expense hereby incurred, he said, was for the advantage of speculators, of which a host was collected in a neighboring city, where, as from a centre, they extended their negotiations to all parts of the Union.

Mr. LAURANCE said, he always considered it as indicative of the badness of a cause, when a person descends to general invectives against public bodies. He alluded to Mr. CLARK's reflection on the City of New York.

Mr. CLARK said, he had not mentioned New York. Mr. LAURANCE said, his remark was applicable to the gentleman's reflection, let him refer to any city whatever. Mr. L. then entered into a general consideration of the subject, and stated the various steps of the process prescribed by the Funding law in relation to transfers. The deductions he drew were similar to those made by Mr. BENSON.

Mr. MURRAY was against the bill. He thought it wrong in principle, and, thinking so, no argument speciously drawn from a small gain to the public, which it was unworthy in them to demand, should tempt him to vote for it. He declared, that when the bill was first noticed, his reflections had presented the provision merely in a sort of analogy with fees justly demanded in Courts, and in common civil offices—as offices for the registering of deeds; but the moment the course of his reflections had traced the subject in that analogy, he discovered a strong and insuperable objection. These institutions, for the support of which fees were demandable from such as had business, were such as the law established for the intercourse between one individual and another; here, on the contrary, the law relates to a proceeding in which a debtor public is to transfer its promissory notes to individual creditors. The public is a debtor, has issued negotiable paper, part of the value of which depends on the facility of negotiation; the necessity of registering transfers being merely to secure the public. As the debt was subscribed under the idea of transfers being free of expense, so to force the parties to pay fees would diminish the value of the property; for, if it be an expense now to the public, and that expense be intended to be taxed on the thing transferred, it would amount to something like diminishing of the debt without discharging it. There is a solid difference between laws that regulate fees to be paid on the transactions between man and man, and such as relate to transactions like this, between a debtor public and an individual creditor. If a debtor constitutes a debt of a negotiable kind, and at the time of issuing his note makes each transfer necessarily to depend on an act of his own, he cannot expect to be paid for this; this quality forms a part of the value he has parted from.

The debate on the subject was continued till a late hour; several other gentlemen spoke on the occasion. The motion to amend the bill was at length agreed to. The Committee then rose, and reported accordingly.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 18.

A petition of the Directors of the Library Company of Philadelphia, and of the Trustees of the Loganian Library, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as imposes a duty on books imported for the use of public libraries, may be repealed.

Proceedings.

[H. or R.]

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Messrs. FINDLEY, LAURANCE, and MURRAY; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the President's Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session for the regulation of the Post Office, made a report; which was read and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States;' and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES, laying before Congress a report and plat of the Territory of the United States on the Potomac, as given in by the Commissioners of that Territory, together with a Letter from the Secretary of State, which accompanied them. The papers referred to in the Message were ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, February 19.

A memorial of sundry merchants and traders of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, was presented to the House and read, stating the disadvantages which attend the operation of the existing revenue laws of the United States, and praying that the same may be revised and amended. Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

A petition of Caleb Newbold, John Black, and Sarah Newbold, executors of the last will and testament of Caleb Newbold, deceased, praying compensation for provisions furnished for the use of the militia and navy of Pennsylvania, in Continental service, during the late war; also, a petition of Thomas Coit, Collector of the Revenue for the Second Division, in the State of Connecticut, praying to be exonerated from the payment of a certain sum of money, which he collected on account of the duties accruing on a quantity of distilled spirits, and deposited in his storehouse at Norwich, in the said State, as a place of safety, and which, together with a part of the money so deposited, was consumed by fire on the night of the 15th ultimo.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of sundry paper-makers in the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as imposes a duty on imported rags used in the manufacture of paper, may be repealed; and also, that the present duty on foreign paper imported into the United States, may remain. Laid on the table.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt be directed to lay before this House a statement of all their proceedings not heretofore furnished."

A motion was made, and the question being put, to amend the said original motion, by inserting, after the word "House," the words, "their resolves as Commissioners, approved by the President of the UNITED STATES, together with;" it passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, John Baptist Ashe, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Sherishub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kitters, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and Artemas Ward.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the Managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, stating that it had been agreed on the part of the United States, that a treaty or conference shall be held at the ensuing season with the hostile Indians Northwest of the Ohio, in order to remove, if possible, all causes of difference, and to establish a solid peace with them; and that, as the estimates heretofore presented to the House for the current year did not contemplate this object, it would be proper that an express provision be made by law, as well for the general expenses of the treaty, as to establish the compensation to be allowed the Commissioners who shall be appointed for the purpose; and that he would direct the Secretary of War to lay before the House an estimate of the expenses which may probably attend this measure.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the estimate referred to in the foregoing Message; which, together with the said Message, was read, and ordered to be committed to Mr. Boudinot, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. WADSWORTH, with instruction to report thereon by way of bill or bills.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from some, and insist on others of their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions;" the Senate have also passed the bill entitled "An act to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the account of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment, and, the same being read, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with sundry statements and reports, containing a further answer to the resolutions of this House, of the twenty-third of January last; which were ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, February 20.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,' together with the amendments agreed to on Monday last, was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petitions of the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, in the territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; whereupon,

Resolved, That there be granted to the said petitioners thirty thousand acres of land, to be divided among them in quantities proportioned to their late purchases of the Scioto Company; and that the further quantity of twenty thousand acres be divided equally among such of the said petitioners as are actual settlers of the said territory.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. BARNWELL, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress, and that Mr. MUHLENBERG, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. SEDGWICK, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of James Warrington, attorney in fact of Joseph Blachford, surviving partner of Harris & Blachford; whereupon, Resolved, That the Accounting Officers of the Treasury cause the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents, charged to John Banks on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, to be credited to the said John Banks, and that the sum so credited be charged to the account of such other person as in their opinion shall be justly chargeable therewith.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GILES, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. FITZSIMONS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendments depending between the two Houses on the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," together with the report of the Committee of Conference on the subject-matter of the said amendments; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth adhere to its disagreement to the amendment insisted on by the Senate to the fourth section of the said bill.

Resolved, That this House doth recede from its disagreement to the amendment insisted on by the Senate to the fifth section of the said bill.

THURSDAY, February 21.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the river Ohio; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his report on the petitions of Rawleigh P. Downman and Oliver Towles; and the same being read, Ordered, That so much of the said report as relates to the petition of Rawleigh P. Downman be referred to Mr. PARKER, Mr. SUMPTER, and Mr. WARD; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That so much of the said report as relates to the petition of Oliver Towles do lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for the following purposes: To regulate the mode of taking bail in certain cases; to regulate the recovery of costs against informers or relators, in certain cases; to point out the mode in which suits for penalties under the revenue laws of the United States shall commence; to extend executions on transcripts of judgments from one district to another, and to regulate the costs and fees in cases of the commitment of witnesses; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BOUDINOT, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, communicating certain reasons for delaying his Report on the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, as directed by the order of the House of the twenty-third February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and suggesting that he is now ready to report on that subject, if the House shall be pleased to direct him so to do.

Ordered, That the said Letter be referred to Mr. GILES, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of Eli Elmer, late a Captain Lieutenant of Artillery in the Army of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for depreciation of pay, supplies of clothing, and other stores, due to him for military services rendered during the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents; which was received, twice read, and committed.

SETTLEMENT OF STATE ACCOUNTS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill received from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to and for amending the act, for extending the time limited for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States."

A motion was made to strike out the first section of the bill. This section goes to repeal the second section of the former act, which makes the State of Vermont a party to the accounts between the United States and individual States. In support of the motion it was said that Vermont, participating in all the advantages of the independence of the country, and, being a member of the Union, is justly chargeable with its quota of all the expenses that have been incurred; that as, on the one hand, were she a creditor State, she doubtless would come in for her proportion of the balances which shall appear to be due from the United States to the creditor States; so on the other, if she is a debtor State, it is but reasonable that she should be liable to pay her proportion of those balances; a contrary principle, it was said, will increase the burdens of other States. It was further said, that in all the great questions relative to the finances and accounts of the United States, the voice of Vermont has had its proportional influence; and she is therefore on every principle to be considered as a constituent part of the Union, and liable to all the disadvantages resulting from the connexion.

In opposition to the motion, it was said that Vermont, as a Government, bore her proportion of the expenses and sacrifices of the war. She was a frontier State, and the only barrier between the United States and Canada. Her exertions during the war were made by her citizens alone, without assistance from the other States. That, in consequence of the peculiar confusion which prevailed in that State, the accounts of her services and supplies were left in a very deranged situation. That though the former act allowed twelve months for her to bring in her claims, yet it is said the other States have had a much longer time. That, though it should be concluded that Vermont ought to be considered as a part of the Confederacy prior to her adoption of the Federal Constitution, the time certainly ought to be extended for her to bring in her accounts. But it was urged that she could not be so considered; and therefore is not a party to the accounts, prior to that period. Since she came into the Union under the new Constitution, she has borne, and will continue to bear her proportion of the burdens of the United States, and will be obliged to pay her proportion of the balances which shall be found due from the Union. In answer to the reasoning from her being represented on the floor of Congress, it was said that the Representatives of that State are Representatives of the Union; that they act in a Legislative capacity, and not as a committee of accounts.

The motion for striking out the first section was negatived. Some further amendments were moved, but disagreed to. The bill was reported without amendment. In the House, Mr. W. SMITH renewed the motion for striking out the first section, and called for the yeas and nays, which were—yeas 17, nays 39, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for exempting from impost duties useful beasts imported for breed.

The bill being read, it was moved to add after the words "for breed," or on rags.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to this motion. He observed that the object of the bill is to encourage the importation of stallions, bulls, and boars, for the purpose of improving the breed of useful animals. These, he said, ought to stand alone; he thought it would be a very odd association to connect them with rags. Besides, said he, I do not conceive there is any necessity for bringing in the article, for when the rage of calling for information is abated, there will be such a diminution of the business of printing, that he doubted not a sufficient quantity of rags might be obtained in the country by the paper-makers.

Other objections were made by several members, and the motion being put, was lost. The bill was then reported without amendment. Some verbal amendments were made in the House. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

FRIDAY, February 22.

A memorial of Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, stating that, in the execution of certain duties, and the performance of sundry services, prescribed by the late Congress, the memorialist made disbursements, and contracted debts, which considerably exceeded the funds placed in his hands, and praying that the officers of the Treasury may be empowered to adjust his accounts, and pay whatever balance may be found due to him.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. HINDMAN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of John Ross, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, was presented to the House and read, praying that a claim for a balance due to the memorialist by the United States, for sundry purchases of merchandise in Europe, on commission, and for which he rendered an account to the late Congress, in the month of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, may be considered and decided on.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. GERRY, Mr. HUGER, and Mr. TUCKER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of Hugh Hughes, of the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for services as Commissary of Military Stores, and Assistant Quartermaster General in the Army of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of the Society "for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, for the relief of persons unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African race," in the States of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, was presented to the House, and read, praying the attention of Congress to the subject of their memorial, presented the eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, relative to the slave trade.

Also, a petition of Elizabeth Fish, late relict and widow of Lieutenant Colonel George Derance, of the county of Luzerne, in the State of Pennsylvania, deceased, praying relief in consideration of the loss of her late husband, who was killed in an engagement with a detachment of British troops and Indians, whilst in the militia service; as also, that she may be reimbursed for the loss of property belonging to the deceased, which was plundered or destroyed by the said detachment, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight.

Also, a petition of Patrick Jack, of Franklin county, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the title to a tract of land of fifteen miles square, on the south side of the Tennessee river, granted to the petitioner, by the late Province of North Carolina, the seventh of May, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-two, and which has since been ceded to the Cherokee Indians, by the United States, at a late treaty, may be restored to him, and himself and his friends permitted to settle thereon, with the consent of the said Indians.

Also, a petition of sundry inhabitants of Nine Mile and Baker's Creek, on the frontiers of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, to the like effect.

Also, a memorial of John Parker, of the city of Philadelphia, praying that such alterations may be made in the act establishing the Post Office, as to place the transmission of monthly publications on the same footing with newspapers published within the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorials and petitions do lie on the table.

Mr. MUELLENBERG, from the committee appointed, presented a bill fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning bail, process, and costs, in the Courts of the United States; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" reported an amendment thereto; which was read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A motion was made and seconded that the House do now adjourn for half an hour.

On which motion, the yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 42, nays 18.

One o'clock, P. M.

The House met, according to adjournment.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis; which was received, twice read, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a further statement in answer to the late resolutions of this House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Appropriation Bill for the year 1793 was taken up, with some amendments of the Senate, one of which was, that in the bill sent to the Senate, the House of Representatives had specified all the items of each sum granted to the support of the War Department; but the Senate's amendment condenses the whole into one aggregate sum. This occasioned some debate; and it was observed that, by thus making one sweeping grant, the particular items are kept out of view, so as to render any future inquiries into the application of the public money extremely difficult, and leaves too much discretionary power in the hands of the Head of the Department; for, although it would be expected that he should apply the money to each particular object of the many expressed in the estimate by him furnished, yet, if they were not also specified in the law, he would not be obligated to pursue this conduct; in fact, he might apply the whole to a few of the objects, perhaps to only one, and leave all the others unsupported. Indeed, it must be granted that there are discretionary powers which ought to be allowed, such as respect particular contingencies, &c., but this should never be permitted to extend to such an extravagant degree as the Senate's amendments would authorize. Several members spoke on the occasion; and it was argued that the items had been already examined and discussed in the House, and that, as the total was not altered by the Senate, there could not be any danger in concurring with the amendments. On the other hand, it was objected that, as there was an expectation of peace with the Indians, and that therefore the recruiting service would be arrested, all these hopes of the public might be frustrated, in case the recruiting service was continued, and larger sums might be applied to it than would be proper, unless the law should expressly limit it. And there was no limitation of specific sums mentioned in the Senate's amendment but the sweeping total of nine hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars, and thirty thousand dollars for contingencies—nearly a round million. It was again urged by those who wished the House to concur with the Senate that a discretionary power lodged in the hands of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES would be a sufficient check; and it was therefore suggested that a committee of conference be appointed between the two Houses, to introduce a clause in the law for this purpose. A discretionary power must be lodged somewhere to meet contingencies; for instance, it may be found expedient to mount the militia, or to vary the mode of carrying on the war, and therefore in some cases to apply the money, specifically appropriated for some of the objects which might upon trial be discovered unnecessary, to other objects of real utility. The debate was continued for a considerable time; and at length the question for concurring was negatived.

The question was then taken, that the House do agree to the said amendment, and passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 31, as follows:

Orr, John Page, Peter Sylvester, John Steele, Samuel Sterrett, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, and Hugh Williamson.

An amendment to the section which authorizes the President to make a Loan to the amount of $300,000, was arrested by an objection to the section itself, which had already passed the two Houses. Without deciding on this amendment, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 23.

An engrossed bill to repeal the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for reimporting the duties heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress, was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to and alteration of an act, entitled 'An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" was read the third time.

The passage of the bill was warmly opposed. The opposition arose from the idea that if the State of Vermont is not considered as a party in the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, as contemplated by the bill, it will operate to the injury of the other States. A motion for recommitting the bill was made and negatived.

And, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 17, as follows:

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the Appropriation Bill was resumed by the House. The amendment to the section authorizing a Loan, in anticipation of the funds, was further debated. Their amendment goes to vest a discretionary power in the President of the UNITED STATES to pay off the Debt due to the Bank of the United States, in instalments not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, having respect to the public exigencies and the state of the Treasury. The discretionary power hereby proposed to be invested was opposed, as not being properly limited, as the provision for paying off the debt in question was irrelevant to the proper idea of an appropriation bill, and as the Legislature ought not to delegate this discretion. It was further opposed, as making an arrangement to pay a debt to a public body before it was due, in preference to paying individuals whose demands are already due. In opposition to this reasoning, it was said that the amendment contemplates a provision in a case which has been the subject of complaint to those who now oppose it; and that is, it vests a power in the President of the UNITED STATES to employ, from time to time, the revenues in the Treasury which may not be especially appropriated for other purposes, to pay off its debts; so that the revenues may not at any time lie useless. That the public moneys should lie dormant and useless in the Treasury (which it was denied has ever been the case) has been a subject of declamation; and now that an unexceptionable expedient is proposed to guard against such a contingency as a surplus revenue would present, the opposition is continued from the same quarter. After a long debate, the question on concurring with the Senate was determined in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 25, as follows:

Proceedings.

[H. or R.]

MONDAY, February 25.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce," and, the same being read, were agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

On motion, the said bill, together with the amendments thereto, was then read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their amendment, to a disagreement to which this House have adhered, to the fourth section of the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions." The Senate also recede from their fifth amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the first section of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for repealing the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for reimporting the duties which have heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to. The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, accompanying a report and statement of all their proceedings, not heretofore furnished, made pursuant to the resolution of the nineteenth instant; which were read, and laid on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for altering the places of holding the Circuit Courts in the districts of Vermont and North Carolina, and for other purposes," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and committed.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred the Letter of the Secretary of State of the twentieth instant, communicating certain reasons for delaying his report on the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, directed by order of the House of the twenty-third of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, reported that it is not expedient to call for the said report during the present session of Congress," which report was agreed to.

On a motion made and seconded, Resolved, That the term for receiving on loan that part of the domestic debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March next, pursuant to the terms proposed in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," and also an act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States," be extended on the same terms as is, by the first recited act provided, to the — day of —; and books for receiving such further subscriptions shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States only, and to continue open until the said — day of —, inclusively.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. Goodhue, Mr. Griffin, and Mr. Gregg, do prepare and bring in the same.

TUESDAY, February 26.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,'" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to provide for the expense of supporting light-houses, not ceded to the United States, and that Mr. Fitzsimons, Mr. Griffin, and Mr. Tredwell, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment, reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio; and, the same being read, was agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Proceedings.

[FEBRUARY, 1793.]

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to take into consideration the reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, it passed in the negative. Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the consideration of the said reports.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

An engrossed bill to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GOODRUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for extending the time for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating certain inaccuracies in printing the statements communicated by his first and second Letters, lately presented, on the subject of Foreign Loans, and expressing a wish that some regulation may be adopted to enable the Head of the Treasury Department to secure the fidelity and correctness of the printed copies of the reports which shall hereafter be made to the House, and shall be committed to the press by their order.

Ordered, That the said Letter be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. DAYTON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GILES, after some pointed animadversions on the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the House pursuant to the resolutions which have been passed, read several resolutions relative thereto; which were handed to the Clerk, again read, and laid on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," the same was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the amendments of this House to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States.'" Whereupon.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments proposed by the Senate to the amendments of this House to the said bill, with the following amendment, to wit: In the amendment of the Senate to the first amendment of this House, after the word "absent," insert these words, "or shall have been of counsel, or be concerned in interest in any cause then pending."

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said amendments.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for altering the places of holding the Circuit Courts in the districts of Vermont and North Carolina, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be recommitted to Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to make further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. TUCKER, do prepare and bring in the same.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer," was read the first time; and, opposition being made thereto, the question was put, "Shall the said bill be rejected?" and passed in the negative. Whereupon, the said bill was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a supplementary estimate of certain sums for which appropriations are necessary; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, with instruction to prepare and bring in a bill or bills pursuant thereto.

Reimbursement of Loan.

[H. OF R.]

A Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES, with a copy of an explanation of an Act of the Legislature of New York, ceding to the United States the jurisdiction of certain lands on Montauk Point, for the purposes mentioned in the said act: And a copy of a Letter from the Governor of New York to the Secretary of State, which accompanied the explanation.

The papers referred to in the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying a copy of the official report made by the officers of the Treasury Department, upon his account of the receipts and expenditures of the public moneys, from the 1st of October to the 31st of December, 1792, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an abstract of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States, from the 1st of October, 1791, to the 30th of September, 1792; also, two returns of impost and tonnage, to the end of the year 1791; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. STERRETT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House adjourned until 6 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION—6 P. M.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOAN.

The House proceeded to consider the bill providing for a reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, which lay on the table. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and the bill being read, a motion was made to strike out the first section, which authorizes a loan.

Mr. BARNWELL said, as he had been in favor of making the loan of two millions, as contemplated in the section, he thought it due to himself and to the Committee to state the reason which will induce him to agree to the motion for striking out the section. It is, said he, because there is not time during the session to go into such an investigation of the subject as it merited; such an investigation, he was persuaded, would convince every unprejudiced mind that it would be for the interest of the United States to effect the loan.

Mr. MADISON was in favor of striking out the section, setting aside the consideration that the United States are not under obligation to discharge the whole sum of two millions at the present time; he very much doubted the policy of making loans at that amount, when the question Whether any saving could be made thereby? is problematical, considering the rate of interest in Europe. He thought it probable, that, before the time came round when the United States might be obliged to discharge the whole of this debt, money may be obtained on more advantageous terms than at present, if it should be found necessary to borrow.

The section was struck out, nem. con.

Several amendments were made to the next section. The Committee then rose and reported the same. The House adopted the amendments, and Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee to whom were referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an abstract of the goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States, from the 1st of October, 1791, to the 30th of September, 1792; also, two returns of impost and tonnage, to the end of the year 1791, made a report. Whereupon, Ordered, That one hundred copies of the said abstract and returns be printed for the use of the members of the two Houses.

THURSDAY, February 28.

An engrossed bill directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

cons, buoys, and public piers, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to increase the salaries of the Commissioner of the Revenue, and the Auditor of Accounts, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. MURRAY, be the said committee.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for altering the places of holding the Circuit Courts in the districts of Vermont and North Carolina, and for other purposes," reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, and said bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the amendment of the Senate to the first amendment of this House, to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States.'" The Senate also adhere to their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress."

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill last mentioned. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the said amendments; that a conference be desired with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the same, and that Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MUELENBERG, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, be appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

Mr. HULLHOUSE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize Ephraim Kimberly to locate the land warrant issued to him for services in the late American Army; which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation to defray the expense of a Treaty with the Indians, Northwest of the Ohio."

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The resolutions brought forward yesterday by Mr. GILES, were called for by that gentleman. The reading being finished, Mr. AMES moved that the resolutions should be taken up.

Mr. MURRAY suggested the necessity of giving a preference to the Judiciary Bill reported by him some days since. He was seconded by Mr. KEY.

The motion for taking up the resolutions was

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

ring those resolutions to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, because he neither viewed a discussion of them as necessary on the present occasion nor warranted by the nature of the inquiry into the Secretary's conduct. It was trifling with the precious time of the House to lavish it on abstract propositions, when the object of the inquiry ought to be into the facts. He was satisfied that should the House once involve itself in an investigation of theoretic principles of Government the short residue of the session would be exhausted, and no opportunity remain for examining the charges themselves. Those charges being made, it became the House from a sense of duty to the public and justice to the accused to proceed immediately to consider them. If the mover intended to apply the principles of the two first resolutions to the facts contained in the subsequent ones, it was unquestionably proper first to substantiate the facts, and then establish the principles which were applicable to them; but it was surely a reversal of order to spend much time in establishing principles, when it might happen that the charges themselves would be totally unsupported. He did not like this mode of proceeding, because it might tend to mislead the House; it was sometimes a parliamentary practice to endeavor to lead the mind to vague and uncertain results, by first laying down theorems from which no one could dissent, and then proceeding by imperceptible shades to move unsettled positions, in order ultimately to entrap the House in a vote which in the first instance it would have rejected. This mode of conducting public business, he considered as inconsistent with fair inquiry. The question was, had the Secretary violated a law? If so, let it be shown; every member was competent to decide so plain a question. He could examine the proofs, read the law, and pronounce him guilty or innocent without the aid of these preliminary metaphysical discussions.

If it were urged that the propositions are so plain and obvious that no time would be lost in considering them, he then begged leave to observe that all antecedent discussions of constitutional questions had never failed to occupy a large portion of their time, and that however self-evident the resolutions might at the first glance appear, a more critical attention would satisfy a mind not much given to doubt that they were by no means so conclusive as to be free from objections. Though the position contained in the first resolution, as a general rule, was not to be denied; yet it must be admitted, that there may be cases of a sufficient urgency to justify a departure from it, and to make it the duty of the Legislature to indemnify an officer; as if an adherence would in particular cases, and under particular circumstances, prove ruinous to the public credit, or prevent the taking measures essential to the public safety, against invasion or insurrection. In cases of that nature, and which cannot be foreseen by the Legislature nor guarded against, a discretionary authority must be deemed to reside in the President, or some other Executive officer, to be exercised for the public good; such exercise instead of being construed into a crime, would always meet the approbation of the National Legislature. If there be any weight in these remarks, it does not then follow as a general rule, that it is essential to the due administration of the Government, that laws making specific appropriations should in all cases whatsoever, and under every public circumstance, be strictly observed. Before the Committee could come to a vote on such a proposition, it would be proper to examine into the exceptions out of the rule, to state all the circumstances which would warrant any departure from it, to whom the exercise of the discretion should be entrusted, and to what extent. Did any member wish at this period to attempt this inquiry? He supposed not. Let every deviation from law be tested by its own merits or demerits.

The second resolution was liable to stronger objections. It might with propriety be questioned whether, as a general rule, the position was well founded. A law making appropriations may be violated in various particulars without infringing the Constitution, which only enjoins that no moneys shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of the appropriations made by law. This is only to say, that every disbursement must be authorized by some appropriation. Where a sum of money is paid out of the Treasury, the payment of which is authorized by law, the Constitution is not violated, yet there may have been a violation of the law in some collateral particulars. There may even have been a shifting of funds, and how-ever exceptionable this may be on other accounts, it would not amount to that species of offence which is created by the Constitution. The Controller of the Treasurer must countersign every warrant, and is responsible that it be authorized by a legal appropriation; yet it cannot be supposed that he is to investigate the source of the fund.

One of the alleged infractions stated in the subsequent resolution, namely, the drawing part of the loans into the United States without the instructions of the President, evinces that the opposite construction is not a sound one. For, suppose the fact proved, and suppose it a violation of the law, it certainly would be a very different thing from drawing money out of the Treasury without an appropriation by law, for, in this case, there would be no drawing money from the Treasury at all, the money never having been in the Treasury.

Mr. S. then said, he should also object to referring the last resolution, which is in these words, "Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to the President."

The object of this resolution went clearly to direct the President to remove the Secretary from office; the foregoing were to determine the guilt, the last to inflict the punishment, and both the one and other without the accused being heard in his defence. When the violation of the Constitution was so uppermost in our minds, it would be indeed astonishing that we should be so hoodwinked as to commit such a palpable violation of it in this instance. The principles of that Constitution, careful of the lives and liberties of the citizens, and what is dearer to every man of honor, his reputation, secure to every individual in every class of society, the precious advantage of being heard before he is condemned.

That Constitution, peculiarly careful of the reputation of great public functionaries, directs that when accused of a breach of duty, the impeach-ment must be voted by a majority of the House of Representatives, and tried by the Senate, who are to be on oath, and two thirds of whom must concur before a sentence can pass, by which the officer is to be deemed guilty. The officer is to be furnished with a copy of the charge, and is heard by himself or his counsel in vindication of his conduct. Such are the solemnities and guards by which they are protected, and which precede a sentence, the only effect of which is a removal from office. But if the House proceed in the manner contemplated by this resolution; if they first vote the charges, and send a copy of them to the President, as an instruction to him to remove the officer, they will violate the sacred and funda-mental principles of this, and every free Govern-ment. They will condemn a man unheard, nay, without his having even been furnished with the charges against him; they will condemn to infa-my a high and responsible officer convicted by the Representatives of the people, of a violation of im-portant trusts committed to him, without af-fording him one opportunity of vindicating his character and justifying his conduct.

Mr. MURRAY said he was opposed to the refer-ence of the resolutions to the Committee of the Whole. He had, as far as the time permitted, ex-aminated the several reports on which the exami-nation depended, and was then ready to vote on them, though he confessed, from the intricacy which was inherent in such a subject, as well as from the vast variety of the detail involved, he had not had sufficient time for a complete inves-tigation. Nor did he imagine that any man who had not previously meditated on the subject for a length of time, and made choice of his ground of attack, could say he was completely master of the subject. Some vote, however, was now rendered essential to the character, not only of Government, but of the gentleman who presided over the finances of the country. But three days were left for this inquiry, and he thought that despatch which was usual in the House ought to be used in preference to the indulgence which a Committee afforded. As to the abstract propositions, if it were neces-sary now to go into them, he thought it would be proper to decide on them first. He thought it most logical to lay down principles of reasoning before facts were developed. Were they agreed to by the House, it would be under provisions and restrictions. They could not have the implicit force of axioms, but at most must be yielded to as wholesome maxims, the application of which must be frequently modified by a certain degree of discretion. With respect to all the other reso-lutions, he imagined they would, on examination, be found to be unwarranted by facts. He hoped the movers and supporters of the resolutions would not be gratified at so late a season by the House in resolving itself into a Committee of the Whole. The mode in which they were brought forward did not entitle them to much confidence. He said a more unhandsome proceeding he had never seen in Congress. It had been a practice, derived from the lights of common liberty, common right, and the first principles of justice, that whoever was charged with a violation of law on which a pun-ishment ensued, should have some mode of an-swering to the charge. It had, in a recent instance, been the practice of Congress, when an officer's conduct was even in the first instance inquired into, to afford the officer an opportunity of attend-ing upon the examination on which his offence or his freedom from blame was to appear. He al-luded to the conduct of the House when an ex-amination took place relatively to the failure of General St. Clair's expedition. Suspicions were entertained that blame lay somewhere. A com-mittee was appointed to examine. The three offi-cers particularly concerned were, he understood, invited, as it were, to come before the committee, to explain, to interrogate, and to give information. Though the Secretary of War was not permitted to explain on this floor, justice and delicacy, and the most common principles of jurisprudence, to which we attempted to hold some analogy, de-manded that he should be heard somewhere, and the committee was renewed for this purpose. The Quartermaster General asked to be heard on this floor. Though refused, he was permitted to attend that committee, on whose examination his character as a Quartermaster depended. Were any man responsible as an officer to this House to fall under the suspicion of its members, a regard to decency and to the established rights of citizen-ship, would teach gentlemen to inquire formally before they hastily laid a charge on the table, to which they might move the assent of the House. But in this proceeding a Legislative charge was gone into before inquiry had been instituted. Every rule of justice, and all that delicacy which ought ever to attend her progress, had been dis-regarded, and in the very first instance, a number of charges are brought forward, not for inquiry, but conviction, which, if sanctioned by a majority of one of the highest officers in the Government, of one of the highest officers in the Government. This mode was as tyrannical as it was new, and, if any thing could throw a bias against the reso-lutions, independent of inquiry, it was the partial and unjust form in which the proceeding had com-menced. Resolutions of conviction might rise out of the report of a committee of inquiry, who would act as a Grand Jury to the House, but could never precede it. He hoped the House would not refer to a Committee of the Whole what might be decided in the House with more despatch.

Mr. Chairman: The more precious our time, the more readily shall I vote for a consideration of the first resolution; for I think it of more conse-quence that we should decide on it, than on any other before us. We find, from the inquiry which has been set on foot, into the conduct of the Se-cretary of the Treasury, that he differs from the mover of the resolution in opinion respecting his powers, and the constitutional obligation he may be under of regarding acts of appropriation; it, therefore, must be the wish of the Secretary him-self, whether we agree with him or not; and it is our duty, as soon as possible, I conceive, to let our constituents know whether we approve, or not, of his opinion. The Secretary himself, I think, confesses "that a strict adherence to appropriations, in certain cases, would be pusillanimity." He pre-ferred, no doubt, the public good, which he thought he had in view, to a strict compliance with an act of appropriation. It becomes us, then, to determine whether we wish that the Secretary shall hereaf-ter be bound by our acts of appropriation or not. I cannot conceive that the rejection of the first resolution can alter the nature of the case before us, or in any manner confirm or invalidate the truth of facts which some gentlemen seem so ap-prehensive may lead to an impeachment. For my part, I keep in view the first resolution, without thinking a moment of the last, or the intermediate propositions. When they shall come under con-sideration, I shall be ready to show a proper atten-tion to them. How the first resolution can be called an abstract proposition, I know not—when the nature of the last before us requires a decision on it. The Secretary himself should desire it, and our constituents must expect it. If the Com-mittee of the Whole shall be of opinion that ap-propriations ought to be sacredly regarded, they will agree to the resolution; if they think they may be dispensed with "in certain cases," they may amend the resolution, and qualify it so as to justify the conduct of the Secretary. To call the resolution a preamble, and to object to it as such, appears to me as extraordinary as to call it an ab-stract proposition; for I have always thought it inconsistent with Republican principles to object to preambles. I have remarked, sir, when they have been objected to, it became the Representa-tives of a free people to show on what principles and with what views their laws are enacted, and not in a dictatorial manner enact that it shall be so and so. The framers of our Constitution have set us an example of an excellent preamble; and, as it has been remarked by several members, this House has occasionally used them; I think, there-fore, that none of the objections to the commit-ment of the first resolution are of sufficient weight to induce the House to agree to the motion for striking out the two first resolutions.

The question was now taken on committing the two first resolutions, and negatived—25 to 32. On the question of referring the last, only fourteen members voted in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions contained in the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent there-in, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The House then adjourned until six o'clock post meridian.

EVENING SESSION—6 P. M.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the conference desired by this House on the subject-matter of the amend-ments depending between the two Houses to the bill entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for extending the time for receiving on loan that part of the Domes-tic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, 1793; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain ap-propriations therein mentioned; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under con-sideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amend-ments, do lie on the table.

FRIDAY, March 1.

An engrossed bill for extending the time for re-ceiving on loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, 1793, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRIZZMOND, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making addition to the compen-sation of the Auditor of the Treasury and the Commissioner of the Revenue; which was twice read, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and mer-chandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,' with an amend-ment to the second amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amend-ment to the amendment, and the same being read, was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Se-nate entitled "An act providing an annual allow-ance for the education of Hugh Mercer," and, after some time spent therein, the bill was report-ed to the House, read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the VICE PRESIDENT having obtained leave of absence, the Senate have proceeded to the choice of a PRESIDENT pro tempore, and JOHN LANGDON has been duly elected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act providing for the compensation of Ebenezer Storer," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Arthur St. Clair, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned; and the same being read, were agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions contained in the motion of yesterday, respecting the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The third resolution being under consideration, in the words following, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law, passed the fourth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the same law, in the following particulars, to wit:

"1. By applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of the interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law.

"2. By drawing part of the same moneys into the United States without the instructions of the President of the United States."

Mr. SEDGWICK opened the debate, by calling for the reading of a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Short, of the 1st of September, 1790, showing the objects and general views of the Secretary, relative to the negotiation of the loans under the two acts authorizing them.

Mr. BARNWELL.—Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to discuss the observations which yesterday fell from the gentleman who introduced the resolutions now before us, I cannot refrain from saying that I am extremely happy that, in passing through the medium of that gentleman's examination, this subject has changed its hue from the foul stain of speculation to the milder coloring of an illegal exercise of discretion, and a want of politeness in the Secretary of the Treasury. I feel happy, because I always am so when any man charged with guilt can acquit himself; and the more so now, when a man in a high responsible office, and high in the estimation of his countrymen, can reduce a charge from a quality calculation, to such a shape as I fancy will scarce serve to satisfy the uncommon curiosity which it appears to have excited. As I have never been in the habit of taking notes, I shall depend upon memory in answering the gentleman from Virginia; although I imagine, as that gentleman usually sticks very close to his point, whatever it may be, that, in pursuing his charges, I shall substantially answer his arguments. In commenting upon the two first resolutions, to which I am by order confined, I shall consider, in the first instance, what regards the right of drawing money into this country. The gentleman appears not to have considered the law properly, for there cannot be a doubt that the President had a right to make what arrangements he pleased, in order to attain what he might consider a proper modification of the Debt due by the United States abroad. He might have borrowed the money here, or have paid it here; he might have borrowed the money in England, or wherever he thought fit. I will ask the gentleman by what precise authority he borrowed the money in Amsterdam and Antwerp, and paid it in Paris? Certainly by none but that discretion which has been depended upon to modify the Debt in the manner most conducive to the interest of the United States. I take it, then, for granted, Mr. Chairman, that the right of the President to draw the money borrowed here, or to send it anywhere, must be conceded. The question will then arise, whether the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to do this or not, and whether this has not been done without, nay, against the instructions of the President? I really consider this as one of the most extraordinary cases that I have ever known exhibited. Let us consider its form. A highly important trust, of no less import than the discretionary use of fourteen millions of dollars, is placed in the President of the UNITED STATES; he, by a general commission, and by special instruction, deposes this power to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that he is to conform to these, and whatever instructions he might from time to time give him. Let any man seriously examine these powers, and I am of opinion that the Secretary, under these, had a right to draw, if he thought proper, unless instructed to the contrary; for the President conveys a complete power to modify the Debt, provided that it should be, with all convenient despatch, applied to pay the principal and interest due to France; for where the payments are to be made are certainly left to the Secretary. If this has not been exercised advantageously, this is another circumstance which the gentleman himself has not questioned. But, says the gentleman, the Secretary, under these instructions, had no special authority to draw; notwithstanding which, he began to draw in 1790, and has continued to draw, at different times, into this country the enormous sum of three millions of dollars, and therefore he must have done this without, nay, against the instructions of the President, who, it is presumed, having delegated this great trust, has never, for three years, inquired into the performance of it. Can this be the inference of common sense? Can this be the inference of the experience of the prominent features of whose character always has been an industry to investigate particulars, as remarkable as his sagacity to frame Generals? If, then, instructions have not been given, or have been exceeded, was it necessary for us to come in aid of the President, he who by our law has the power, which we ourselves cannot exercise, of removing any of the Executive officers at pleasure? It certainly cannot be necessary; for, as this officer continues to act, we must conclude that he has either acted by instructions, or in such manner as to have given satisfaction to his principal without them. Really, Mr. Chairman, I cannot but believe that if suspicion had not led the gentleman from Virginia astray, the usual correctness of his understanding would have prevented him from pursuing such an ignis fatuus as this. Thus, sir, I think I have shown that the President of the UNITED STATES certainly had the authority to draw the sums borrowed here, and that, both under his commission and his instructions given, and inevitably implied, the Secretary had also the power to do this. I shall therefore now proceed to a more special consideration of the first charge, that the Secretary has violated the law in applying a portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of the interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by law. Before I proceed, Mr. Chairman, I would wish to remark that, whilst I consider no principle in legislation more correct than that money shall be drawn from the Treasury only under appropriations by law, yet I consider both as impracticable and mischievous the doctrine that the money arising from a special tax shall, in no instance, be used for any other than that special purpose for which the tax was imposed, but am of opinion that the sums raised ought rather to be considered as an aggregate fund, applicable to aggregate purposes; and, indeed, if a rigid adherence to the precise letter of the law is necessary, there has been no occasion to go abroad to search for violations; for our Government at home has been able to act only by this violation. It is well known that the duties of impost and tonnage are appropriated, first, to produce the sum of six hundred thousand dollars for the civil list, then to pay the interest of the Foreign Debt, and so on; so that, by a rigid observance of this law, the Secretary must have first collected the six hundred thousand dollars into the public coffers, and then a sum sufficient to pay the interest of the Foreign Debt—a process which only requires stating to show its absurdity, and which must nevertheless have been connected with a minute construction of the law. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if the acts of common life bear any analogy with public management, which I believe, what could be considered as being more extraordinary than that an individual should appropriate the proceeds of one farm to purchase bread, of another drink, and to declare, in the face of contingencies, that, happen what may, he would starve, should the bread crop fail, rather than use the surplus of that appropriated to purchase drink for its purchase. But to return. What is this charge? A sum of money was due abroad for the interest of 1791 and 1792, to be paid out of the domestic revenues of 1791 and 1792; the United States had an offer to make a payment in part of what was due to France, for which money had been borrowed, and was already on hand abroad, in a supply of provisions from here to the Island of St. Domingo. The Secretary, therefore, and doubtless with the consent of the President, instead of transmitting either bills or money from this country to France, in order to pay the interest due there, and bringing the money borrowed to pay the French Debt into this country, in order to furnish supplies for St. Domingo, has committed the great crime of directing the money borrowed, and already upon the spot, to be applied to the payment of the interest due, and has taken the sums applicable to the payments of that interest, which was already here, and made use of it to pay the Debt due to France in the produce of the United States; so that, although, apparently, a portion of the principal borrowed has been applied to pay an interest due, yet in reality its capacity to be thus used arose from its constituting in this country an equivalent sum applicable, and which has been applied to pay off the principal of the French Debt, the object for which the money was borrowed. Let candor investigate this transaction, and sure I am its deductions will be directly the contrary of a charge of criminality. I shall conclude with observing that I should have proceeded to examine the other resolutions, which I consider as weak as those I have made short comments upon, were I not restrained by the Rules of the House. But this I will venture to say, that they will be proved unfounded in their investigation, and will merit the witty observation of a celebrated writer, that "though they rose like a rocket, they will fall like the stick."

Mr. W. SMITH regretted that so important an inquiry had been instituted at the very close of the session, when the members were thronged with business of an indispensable nature, and it was scarcely possible for them to bestow that attention and deliberation which the nature of the subject called for. But, while he expressed this regret, he assured the Committee that it was mingled with much satisfaction, in finding that the vague charges of mismanagement, with which the public had long been alarmed, were at length cast into a shape susceptible of investigation and decision. Previous to an examination of the specific charge then under consideration, he claimed the indulgence of the Committee in offering a few preliminary remarks, which, though they did not bear precisely upon the charge itself, yet were intimately connected with the subject-matter of the inquiry, and were justified by the general remarks of gentlemen who had preceded him.

In recurring back to the origin and progress of this examination, it must appear somewhat surprising that that which, in the commencement of the session, was sounded forth as gross speculation, now turned out to be nothing more than a mere substitution of funds, and that which was announced as abominable corruption, was dwindled away into a mere drawing of money from Europe into this country, to be applied here according to law.

Whatever credit might be due to the motives which had originated this inquiry, every member would concur in the sentiment, that in a Government constituted like that of the United States, which had nothing but the public confidence for its basis, premature alarms and groundless suspicions respecting the conduct of public officers were pregnant with the most injurious consequences. This opinion was more peculiarly applicable to the important station of Secretary of the Treasury. Intrusted with the management of a large revenue, and necessarily clothed with some latitude of discretion, it was to be expected that he would excite the jealousy of the public vigilance; but as long as he kept in view the injunctions of law, and the public good, his reputation was entitled to that security which is due to every citizen.

An officer, intrusted with the care and distribution of public moneys, is generally looked at with a watchful eye; mankind are too prone to suspect the purity of his conduct; slight insinuations are but too often sufficient to injure him in the public estimation. Such being the natural propensity of things, it doubtless behoved those who wished for tranquility in the country to withhold charges not clearly warranted by proof—to suspend animadversions which were not likely to terminate in conviction. A contrary proceeding had an inevitable tendency unnecessarily to alarm the public mind, to instil into it suspicions against the integrity of men in high stations, to weaken their public confidence in the Government, and to enervate its operations.

There was something remarkable in the nature of the present allegations against the Secretary. Taking them all into view, they presented nothing which involved self-interest, pecuniary considerations; and in this, they essentially differed from accusations against financiers in other countries, to whom motives of interest were generally ascribed as the source of their peculations. To the Secretary, no such motive was imputed; notwithstanding former insinuations against his integrity, the sum of all the charges now amounted to nothing more than arrogance, or an assumption of power, or an exercise of unauthorized discretion.

With respect to discretion, Mr. S. observed that, though in the present inquiry it was not necessary to say much on that topic, being firmly persuaded the Secretary had strictly pursued the injunctions of law, yet, while on the subject, he took occasion to insist that in all Governments a discretionary latitude was implied in Executive officers, where that discretion resulted from the nature of the office, or was in pursuance of general authority delegated by law. This principle was so obvious that it required no illustration; were it contradicted, he would appeal to the conduct of the Secretary of State, who, though directed to report to the House on the commercial intercourse with foreign nations, had, in the exercise of a warrantable discretion, judiciously withheld his Report. He would appeal to the Report of the Committee on the failure of St. Clair's expedition, wherein that failure was in part attributed to the Commanding General's not being invested with a discretion to act according to circumstances.

There was one more observation which he thought proper to premise, before he entered into a discussion of the charges; and that was the disadvantageous situation in which the financier of this country was placed, when compared with that of similar officers in other nations. The Minister of Finance in Great Britain being always a member of the Legislature, and on a footing with other members, was prepared to defend himself when attacked. No charge could be made against his administration which he had not an immediate opportunity of repelling; and the charge and the refutation went out to the world together. The Secretary of the Treasury was, on the contrary, not even permitted to come to the bar and to vindicate himself. Through the imperfect medium of written reports he was compelled, when called upon for information, to answer, as it were by anticipation, charges which were not specific, without knowing precisely against what part of his administration subsequent specific charges would be brought to bear.

If in his reports he was concise, he was censured for suppressing information; if he entered into a vindication of the motives which influenced his conduct, he was then criminated for stuffing his reports with metaphysical reasonings. A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FINDLEY] had said that the Secretary's reports were so voluminous that he was quite bewildered by them, and that instead of their throwing any light on the subject, he was more in the dark than ever. It was true, the reports were voluminous, but not more so than the imputations on the Secretary's conduct and the orders of the House justified. He did not think that any member, who had attentively perused them, could justly complain of want of information, or of being more in the dark than before; he, on the contrary, believed that so much light had been thrown on the whole of the Secretary's fiscal operations, that if any member could not see, it must be owing to the glare of light being too strong for his eyes. Having made these observations, Mr. S. said he should proceed to examine the first charge, which, after much reflection bestowed on it, appeared to him to contain nothing that was not perfectly authorized by the strict letter of the law.

Mr. S. proceeded next to examine the charge under consideration. It consisted of two items: the first, the application of a certain portion of the principal sum borrowed in Europe to the payment of interest falling due upon that principal, which it was contended was not authorized by any law; the second, the drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instructions of the President.

The first item of this supposed violation of law appeared of so frivolous a nature that it did not merit much discussion; at any rate, it was more an objection of form than of substance. If he comprehended well the purport of the charge, it was nothing more than this—that the Secretary was having moneys at his disposal in Europe applicable to the purchase of stock in this country, and having at the same time moneys in this country

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

applicable to the payment of the interest abroad had substituted the one for the other. He had paid the foreign interest out of the foreign funds and he had purchased stock with the domestic funds. This was the heinous offence with which he was charged, and which was thought sufficient to remove him from office. If the moneys in Europe might have been drawn to this country by bills, for the purchase of the Debt, it might have equally been drawn here, by ordering the application of a sum in Europe, for a purpose which would be represented by an equal sum here, to be applied to the purchase. The substance, not the form, is to decide whether this mode of negotiating the matter was proper. Suppose bills had been ordered to be drawn on the Commissioners, and remitted to them, on account of the foreign interest, would not this have been as regular as to draw them for sale? Did the execution of the law require that the Secretary, having funds in Europe with which the foreign interest might be discharged, should nevertheless remit moneys abroad for that purpose, and then, having funds in this country with which the purchases of the Debt might be made, should draw bills to bring the foreign funds here? Was there any necessity for this complex operation, for the expense of remittance, the probable loss on the sale of bills, the loss of interest while the money was in transitu when the whole matter could be negotiated by the simple and economical mode pursued? So far from this arrangement being a ground of censure, Mr. S. asserted that, had the Secretary pursued the other mode, he would have been animated upon with great severity for such an extraordinary course. He would have been accused of ignorance of his duty, and every loss incidental to the transaction would have been charged to his account.

The second division of the charge, being of more magnitude, required a more lengthy discussion. This instance of violation consisted in a supposed deviation from the instructions of the President, or a supposed acting without any instruction whatever. It was, however, begging the question; it was taking for granted that which did not appear, and which ought not to be presumed. And here, Mr. S. observed, the gentlemen on the other side had entirely reversed one of the fundamental maxims of criminal jurisprudence, which declared that innocence should be presumed and guilt proved; whereas they had presumed guilt, and called upon the accused to prove his innocence.

And what was the slender basis on which the presumption was built? Why, say the gentlemen, the instructions from the President to the Secretary, which have been laid before the House, relate only to the payment of the French debt, and convey no authority to draw any of the foreign loan into this country for the purchase of stock; and hence they infer, he had no authority for this latter purpose.

To comprehend the fallacy of the inference, it was only necessary to recur to the laws, and to the President's commission to the Secretary to negotiate the loans. Two acts of Congress had passed; one on the 4th of August, the other on the 12th of August, 1790. The first authorized a loan of twelve millions of dollars, applicable to the payment of the French debt; the other a loan of two millions, applicable to the purchase of the Domestic Debt. The President's commission to the Secretary embraced both acts and both objects, and under that commission one loan was negotiated applicable to both objects. True it is, that the President's first instructions were confined to one object, namely, the French debt; but the inference is not that no other instructions were given, and that the Secretary acted without authority; but the very reverse, that the President either left the other object to the general discretion of the Secretary, who was, ex officio, the proper agent and his representative; or that he reserved it for subsequent and occasional instructions.

This inference must be the true one; first, because a contrary supposition would impute to the President an illegal intention, that of applying all the moneys borrowed under both acts to the object of one only; secondly, because the commission extending to the borrowing fourteen millions of dollars, and embracing both objects, and the instructions being confined to twelve millions of dollars, and to only one object, it followed that the other either was left to discretionary management, or to after regulation, for the law enjoined the execution of both.

If presumption, then, was to govern, the more natural presumption was, that the officer acted according to some general discretion reposed in him, or according to instructions from time to time given. These instructions may have been verbal, as well as written. The written instructions given in the first instance were evidently confined to the object of the first act. The necessary conclusion is, that the application of the moneys borrowed under the second act was not meant to be included in that instruction, but was left to be regulated by a general discretion, or by occasional directions, verbal or otherwise.

To presume that the Secretary acted without the sanction of the President was to suppose that the President was totally ignorant of the application of any part of the loan to the purchase of the debt. But there is in the possession of the House abundant testimony of the President's privity and co-operation—

1st. In his Speech to both Houses, in December, 1790, in announcing the loan, he expressly refers to its being made by virtue of both acts, thereby implying clearly that it had reference to the objects of both. He therein likewise refers the House to a further communication from the Secretary on that subject.

2dly. The Secretary, pursuant to that reference, informed the House, in the name and by order of the President, that a part of the loan, to wit: 150,000 florins, was applied in payment to France; another part, to wit: 160,000 florins, to the Dutch debt; and that it was deemed highly advisable to apply the residue to the purchase of the debt, if Congress would remove a doubt as to the terms on which the loan had been negotiated. Congress did remove that doubt by their act of March, 1791. It followed, then, of course, that the residue would be applied according to the intimation given. It was so understood on all hands, and the money being of course that it must be drawn wise followed of course that it must be drawn here. A contrary conduct would have been censurable. And yet, notwithstanding these facts, though the President had informed the House, as far back as December, 1790, that the loan had been a conjunct loan, under the authority of both acts, and consequently for both objects, though, at the same time, he had referred the House to the Secretary for further information in relation to that loan and its applicability, though the Secretary had, in the name and by order of the President, informed the House, by his Report in February, 1791, that only a part of the money borrowed had been applied to the French and Dutch debt, and that the residue would be applied to the purchase of stock, as soon as Congress removed the doubt; though Congress passed a law expressly to remove that doubt, yet it had been gravely and earnestly contended that the Secretary was not authorized to apply any part of that money to the purchase of stock; that it was done without the sanction of the President; and that Congress, until the late call for information, were totally ignorant of the application of any part of it to that object.

There was, then, the fullest and most satisfactory evidence of the privacy and concurrence of the President in confirmation of the evidence resulting from official relation. Between the Chief Magistrate and his immediate agents either a general discretion or instruction must be presumed, because it is presumable he will do his duty, and punish where either a discretion has not been allowed, or instructions have not been given, or where those instructions have been contravened.

The argument on the other side implies in the Chief Magistrate either ignorance or neglect of duty. On the one hand, that he was unacquainted with the transaction; or, on the other, that, being acquainted, he acquiesced in a violation of law, without removing the transgressor. Could it be seriously said—would it not be absurdity to suppose—that an operation of such extent, provided for by law, communicated to both Houses, notorious to all the merchants of Philadelphia and New York, as that of drawing and selling the bills of Europe, was unknown to the President?

Must he not have been well acquainted with these transactions, and that without daily frequenting the coffee-house, as some of his friends lately advised him? If the instructions or the intentions of the President had been contravened, would he not have vindicated his own authority by removing the officer? But it had been objected that the bills were drawn previous to the sanction of the Legislature by the confirmatory act of March, 1791. Admit the fact, and there was nothing reprehensible in it. It appears, from the first general instructions to Mr. Short, in August 1790, that the Secretary considered ordinary charges and five per cent. interest as within the meaning of the law. Pursuing this construction, and believing it to be very important to the general operations of the Treasury, he drew for the money, reserving himself as to the final application for an act of the House removing the doubt. The drawing for the money was a mere intermediate step, which amounted neither to a breach, nor to a fulfilment of the law, which was wholly silent on that point. The application was the criterion whether the law had been fulfilled or not. If the Legislature had not removed the doubt, the money would have been remitted back for the foreign object, and, from the relative price of public and private bills, without loss, probably with advantage. It was prudent, in the mean time, to place it where it was likely to be most useful. This was done. It was indeed remarkable that all the points now raised as objections were made known in the report, before alluded to, of February, 1791, as things done or intended. No objection was then made or dreamed of.

It has been asked, Why have the instructions not been produced, if any existed? The call had been only for copies of authorities; the instructions may have been verbal. The Secretary, in his Report on Loans, informed the House "that, besides the first general instructions, the trust reposed in him was to be regulated by subsequent and occasional directions." A motive very honorable to him might be assigned for his not bringing forward the President's instructions as a cover. Relying that the province of the House was to examine into the effects of measures, their conformity to law and the public good, and that the necessary Executive instructions were to be presumed, the Secretary had evidently chosen to implicate the President as little as possible.

The order requested the President to lay before the House copies of the authorities directing the application of the moneys borrowed. It was evident that the President construed this order into a call, not for the instructions from him to the Secretary, but for the instructions from the Secretary to his agents; because, in the report made in pursuance of that order, the Secretary presents, by order of the President, his own letters to Messrs. Short, Willink, and Van Staphorst, as the authorities to apply the proceeds of the loans. It followed, therefore, that the paper relied on was not intended to be given as the only instruction respecting the application of the loan. The inference from it was consequently erroneous. The President could never conceive that the House meant to call for his private instructions from time to time imparted to his immediate agent under the words of the resolution. That link must have been presumed. He therefore directed a transmission of the authorities from the Secretary to his agents.

But what has the want or breach of instructions to do with the breach of the law? Suppose no instructions given, or the instructions not pursued, and yet suppose the law to have been completely pursued, could it be said there was any breach of law? Or suppose instructions given and strictly pursued, and the law to have been departed from, would the adherence to instructions have justified that departure? Either what was done was nugatory, or it would have been agreeable to law. To affirm the contrary, would be to confound two things perfectly distinct—instructions and laws.

The resolution imports that the Secretary has violated the law of the 4th of August, 1790, by not pursuing the instructions of the President. That law is silent as to instructions. It does not require that the President shall give instructions to the Secretary; nor does it require that the Secretary shall be alone guided by the instructions of the President. It only directs the President to cause a certain sum to be borrowed, and leaves it to him to cause a proper application to be made of the proceeds. The drawing money into this country, with or without authority, to apply it to the purchase of the debt, cannot be deemed a violation of the law of the 4th of August, for it was not loaned under the authority of that act alone, but under the joint authority of the two acts. If any thing is meant by the resolution, it ought to mention both the acts.

To go further, Mr. S. insisted that the Secretary had, virtute officii, a legal authority to apply the moneys when borrowed, according to law, without instructions. The loans might have been made in the United States as well as abroad. Suppose them obtained of the Bank of Boston, would it have been criminal for the Secretary, without instructions, to have drawn the money to the places where it would be most advantageously invested? Suppose the loan obtained of the Bank of the United States, would it have been deemed irregular to have, without instructions, issued a warrant to place them in the Treasury? Why was it more irregular or more criminal to draw them from abroad as a preliminary step?

The moment the foreign loans were negotiated, and the moneys paid into the hands of the Secretary's agents abroad, from that moment they became as much under his control and superintendence, subject to legal appropriation, as any moneys in the Treasury. It was not necessary, to establish this position, that the subject of foreign loans should have been specially mentioned in the constitution of the Treasury Department. Many things resulted collaterally from the general structure of an institution which were not expressed in it.

He did not, however, intend that the doctrine here advanced should touch the question as to what official propriety might have required between the Chief Magistrate and the Secretary. It was the point of legality only which he meant to examine. In all Executive functions relating to the finances, the Secretary must be considered as the agent of the President, and the Legislature must take it for granted, where the contrary is not manifest, that the relation has been properly attended to. Justice to both characters dictated the presumption.

It clearly resulted from these remarks—

1st. That there was no ground to infer either want of instruction, or breach of instruction; but directly the reverse.

2dly. It as clearly resulted, that, if there was, it would not follow that there had been a violation of law.

Having gone through this resolution, Mr. S. observed, that, if there was as little of criminality in the subsequent charges as in that which he had just discussed—and from an attentive examination he sincerely believed it—he was satisfied that, notwithstanding all the severe animadversions within, and all the virulent calumny without, the walls of Congress, the conduct of the Secretary would come forth chaste and unblemished. Instead of anything being detected which would disgrace Pandemonium, nothing could be chargeable to him which would sully the purest angel in Heaven. Whatever difference of opinion might exist as to the wisdom and benefit of his measures, he was confident in saying, that in every thing the Secretary had done, he had been guided by principles honorable and patriotic, and he trusted that a very great majority of the Committee would, by their votes, evince the same sentiment. The sword of justice, it was said, ought at times to be taken from its scabbard to keep great public functionaries within the pale of the law; but it should be remembered that if Justice had its sword to punish the guilty, it had likewise its shield to protect the innocent. If the Secretary had committed a wanton violation of law, let the sword be drawn forth for his punishment; but if he has pursued the dictates of an enlightened patriotism, the Committee were called upon to raise the shield for the defence of a faithful officer.

Mr. FINDLEY addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Chairman: Being strongly impressed with the importance of our time, which is now so near an end, though I had the honor of seconding the resolutions, I took no part in the debates of yesterday; nor will I now detain you with replies to many of the arguments which have been offered against the resolution now under discussion.

Upon one argument frequently introduced by the gentleman last up, viz: the greatness of the Secretary's character, &c., I will only make a single remark. There is no character officially known in Executive Departments of this Government, who merits pre-eminence, or to whom a degree of greatness can be ascribed, but in proportion to his prompt execution of the laws, and the attention with which he discharges the duties of his office. From this rule, the President himself is not exempted, much less a subordinate Secretary, whose appointment is during pleasure, and the duties assigned him of a changeable and temporary nature. But to come to the resolution before us. The first questions that offer themselves, are: Was the money in question appropriated to special and distinct purposes? Did the Secretary of the Treasury apply the money to other uses than the law directed?

In answer to the first, it is only necessary to advert to the law authorizing the loans. The law authorizing the twelve million loan, appropriates whatever amount may be borrowed solely to the payment of debts then due to France and Holland. The law authorizing the two million loan directs the application thereof to the redemption of the Domestic Debt, in aid of about — dollars, arising from the revenues previous to the 1st of January. — These appropriations are precise, distinct, and unconditional. With respect to the uses, no room was left for the exercise of discretion. The will of the Legislature was expressed and clearly defined; it left no room for evasion, nor any excuse for mistake; nor did the President transfer to the Secretary any other authority or instructions than what the law expressed.

H. OF R.]

Official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

But the gentleman from South Carolina says, that the presumption is, that the President did give other instructions than he has communicated; that, in this case, presumption should be admitted as conclusive testimony, and that neither the Secretary nor the President is obliged to communicate the instructions or authority to us. The gentleman is a lawyer: I will appeal to himself; I will appeal to all the professional members on the floor, whether presumptions can be admitted as proof, where, in the nature of the case, positive testimony can be procured. Surely, in Courts of Justice, positive testimony is always required, and presumptive is rarely admitted; but in this case, the presumptive is by the gentleman set in opposition to the positive. However, this is not the case in fact. The President did give commission and instructions, and those are fully communicated to us. If he conceived we had no right to demand them, he would have told us so; if he had kept any part of them back, he would have informed us, and assigned his reasons for doing so. I presume that the President has acted from a candid, honest man; the gentleman presumes the reverse. The suggestion that this House, which has the exclusive right of originating the appropriation of money, has no right to be informed of the application of it, is so novel and extraordinary, so inconsistent with every idea of propriety and good Government, that it requires no reply.

Did the Secretary apply the money borrowed in Europe agreeably to the legal appropriations and the instructions of the President? No, he did not; though some of the gentlemen do not acknowledge this, yet the Secretary has clearly acknowledged it himself, and has filled his Reports with labored and ingenious apologies for so doing. He has suggested a variety of motives, and taken infinite pains to charm us with the mighty public advantages resulting from his doing so. He acknowledges combining the loans, and directing the application of them, in the very offset, in a way contrary to law; he acknowledges having drawn to this country, and applied in Europe, to uses for which other moneys were appropriated, near $3,000,000. Out of this he has paid upwards of $400,000 of the French debt, to St. Domingo. I do not complain of paying the interest due in Europe out of the money drawn here. The gentlemen apply the force of their arguments, with great attention, to support or apologize for this part of the Secretary's conduct, as if against this only the charge in the resolution lay. But we do not object to applying that money in Holland, which ought to have been brought here, if the money which, according to the appropriation, should have gone to Holland, had been put to the use here for which the other was intended. A simple exchange of money for the purposes of convenience or economy, is properly one of those cases to which Ministerial discretion may safely be extended; but the question before us is, the money has not been replaced. The amount of money has not been applied to the uses intended; consequently, the appropriation has been disregarded. It is acknowledged that though there were upwards of $1,300,000 of the Domestic Sinking Fund, and upwards of $2,300,000 drawn from Europe, besides the moneys applied to the relief of St. Domingo; and yet, when these inquiries began, there was not $1,000,000 applied to the redemption of the Public Debt, and even yet the whole of the domestic appropriation has not been applied to the Sinking Fund, notwithstanding that the Public Debt is now, and has for some time been under par. We have it on record that the Secretary never informed the Commissioners of the drafts he made on Europe, although the fund was exclusively to be at their disposal.

However, I will not detain the Committee with minute calculations. They are not necessary; the Secretary has acknowledged that he drew more money from Europe than the law authorized him to do; that he was influenced to do so by motives not contemplated in the law, and had either applied it, or drew it from Europe with the design of applying it to uses not authorized, and that he has broken in upon the fund appropriated to the discharge of the French debt.

Indeed, the delay of information, the receiving it by piecemeal, the abundance of reasoning and apologies, when only simple and plain statements were required, renders a scrutiny of all his calculations a work of time and labor. Therefore, I have contented myself with the facts which the Secretary acknowledges and vindicates on the questionable ground of policy. It remains to be inquired, had the Secretary a right to depart from the directions of the law in the execution of it? Could he, without a violation of the law, divert the money from its appropriate uses, to purposes foreign to the intention of the Legislature? He certainly could not.

The application of appropriations is the most sacred and important trust the Legislature can confer. If they may be made to bend to the will or projecting policy of a Financier, there is an end of all security and confidence. When the Legislature makes an appropriation of a general fund to a variety of uses, as has been done with respect to the impost, tonnage, excise, &c., there is necessarily a considerable degree of discretion left with the Executive, as far as respects preference to one or the other of the appropriate uses. But where the money is appropriated solely to a special purpose, as in the case of the loans, he who executes the law has no degree of power over the appropriation. There is ample room for discretion in many material circumstances respecting them, such as the terms of contract, the time of drawing, the agents employed, &c., but to assume or exercise the power of changing the appropriation is assuming a power to repeal the law itself in its most essential authority; it is assuming that power of dispensing with the laws which produced the late revolution in Britain. If the will of the Minister may control and give another direction to the will of the Legislature, the Sovereign Legislative authority is transferred from the Representative of the people to the temporary Minister. If we admit that the Ministerial agent is not responsible for his conduct, nor subject to censure, because he is appointed, and in this instance authorized by the President we will introduce the long-exploded doctrine of Charles I. of Britain, which brought ruin on the King and the Government. However, there is an essential difference, for in the case before us, the authority and instructions given by the President were agreeably to the law, but the conduct of the Minister was contrary to both. If, as I have said, the application of money to its appropriated uses, is the most sacred and important trust which the Legislature can confer; if the person who can apply the money to what use he pleases, may, by that means, command all the influence and all the force of the Government, I conclude that betraying the important trust partakes of the nature of treason.

The question before us is, not whether the Secretary has applied the money to a good or to a bad use? Whether he has, by departing from the legal appropriation, supported public credit better, or made a more convenient accommodation to what he or his friend may suppose to be the national interests. Neither the Constitution nor the laws have constituted him the judge of the national interests, nor submitted it to his wisdom to prescribe the degree of public credit which the nation ought to possess. The public credit and other national interests ought to be no other than the Legislature wills them to be, and ought only to be supported by the means, and in the manner thereby prescribed. This is the voice of the Constitution, the voice of the law, and the voice of reason. The President and both branches of the Legislature being the real, as well as the legal Representatives of the people, it is reasonable that they should be the sole judges of their interests. When this House repeatedly called for information from the Secretary, they did not call for political essays nor labored apologies; they did not constitute him the judge for, nor the instructor of the Legislature; they cared nothing about his variety of motives, nor his extensive and self-important plans. These he might have referred to embellish a system of finance, when he would again be called upon to report one to the House. They only required an account of his stewardship. It was time enough to make apologies when he was blamed; prefacing his statements with apologies, and being irritated at inquiries, and artfully evading so many calls for information, discovered a consciousness of blame.

However, I will admit that an Executive officer, pressed by some urgent and unexpected necessity, may be induced to depart from the authorized path of duty, and have great merit in so doing. This may be the case with the General of an army or the Admiral of a fleet, and, though more rarely, even with a Financier. But in such emergency, the officer so acting will embrace the earliest opportunity to explain the matter and obtain a justification, whilst the recent feelings arising from the occasion advocates his cause in the public mind.

Has the Secretary done so in the present instance? No: his conduct has been the very reverse. Notwithstanding repeated and explicit calls, both at the last session and the present, the extent of these transactions was concealed. A bill passed this House authorizing another loan of $800,000; a second bill was urged in an unprecedented manner, for a loan of $2,000,000; and, though this was a favorite bill with the Minister, the very inquiry after this information induced his friends to shrink from the matter, and desert the object about which they had discovered so much solicitude. But when the disclosure is made, does there appear any urgent necessity to justify this measure? No; there was none except what existed to the unauthorized plans of the Financier. He informs us that he thought it necessary to have always $500,000 or $600,000 at his command. I ask what law authorized him to think so? Did the Legislature judge this necessary? No. Did he ever state the necessity to the Legislature, and recommend such a provision? No, he did not; and we know he has never been backward in recommending Revenue Systems, nor in contriving uses for revenue. Supposing a sudden necessity for money, arising from a disappointment of some remittance, where was the boasted aid of the Bank, which was to have administered aid in all sudden emergencies? Could not bills have been sold for cash when the necessity pressed? Or could not a temporary loan have been procured from any of the banks? Certainly they could. Loans were obtained at the Bank when no necessity required such aid, and when the public money, to a much greater amount, was deposited with the Bank. In short, no necessity of State, for purposes authorized by the Legislature, existed. If there was a necessity at all, it must have arisen from another quarter—most probably from the Bank itself and its branches. A key to this suggestion may be discovered from a comparison of drawing at the times, and the situation of the Bank at such times? [Here Mr. FINDLEY was called to order, upon the ground of his arguments not being confined to the resolution before the Committee.] He alleged his arguments applied strictly to the charge of violating the law contained in the resolution; but as a further opportunity of applying the arguments arising from necessity and discretion would be given when a subsequent resolution was brought before the Committee, he would pass it now, and conclude with a very few remarks. He said the exercise of the power assumed by the Secretary, was inconsistent with that public confidence upon which the Government alone was founded; that it was inconsistent with public safety and a Government of laws; that the Secretary seemed to take the whole Government upon his shoulders, and to consider all the great interests thereof to be committed to his providence. His reports spoke the language of a Frederick of Prussia, or some other despot Prince, who had all the political powers vested in himself—not the language of a dependent Secretary, under a free and well-ordered Government.

Mr. GILLES rose.—He was sensible that he stood in a peculiarly delicate situation, in which nothing short of the public good could have induced him to place himself. If a public and highly responsible officer had violated the laws, it was necessary that he should be called to an account for it; and to determine whether in the instances before the House, he had been guilty of that violation, it is necessary to compare the testimony with the facts alleged in the resolutions before the Committee. He first adverted to the law authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to borrow twelve millions of dollars for the purpose of paying the foreign debt. On this, he remarked that the authority of borrowing was expressly given to the PRESIDENT, no doubt, with an eye to the personal virtues of the character who fills that office; the loan is also directed to be made solely for the purpose of paying the Public Debt. Here he remarked, that in every appropriation law, the appropriation is always emphatically mentioned, which is an evidence that the Legislature intend to remain the sole judges of the appropriations of money. He read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, who was employed by the PRESIDENT to negotiate this loan, to Mr. Short, the Secretary's Foreign agent for this purpose, dated the 9th of May, 1791, in which the Secretary informs Mr. Short, that one million and a half of the money he had obtained on loan, was destined for France; of which sum he was authorized to apply immediately one million, but to reserve eight hundred thousand florins to answer such subsequent directions as he should receive from the PRESIDENT. He cited this passage to show that the million and a half which had been obtained on loan, was destined for France.

To remove any doubt that might remain upon this head, he referred to a preceding letter from the Secretary to Mr. Short, dated the 13th of April, in which it is also expressly said, that of the two millions borrowed, one million and a half is intended for France, the remaining half million to wait for further directions. Having established this point, he adverted to the resolution before the Committee, which says, that he applied a portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of the interest falling due upon that principal, without being authorized so to do by any law. To show this, he referred to a report of the 3d of January, containing sundry statements respecting foreign loans. That part of the Report to which he alluded in proof of the fact, stated in general terms, a sum paid on account of foreign loans, and this sum was taken from the principal borrowed, and amounted to 1,833,189 florins. If his statement was accurate, the fact he wished to establish was proved. He wanted more light, he confessed, than he could collect from the Secretary's official communications. He should not go into the examination of what circumstances might have induced the Secretary to deviate from the positive injunctions of the law, or to make any remarks upon his conduct, until he had heard what gentlemen would say to controvert the fact he wished to establish.

Another fact of consequence he wished to prove, viz: that part of the money obtained on loan in Europe had been drawn over, though not wanted here for any public purpose. This appeared from other papers. He turned to the instructions from the PRESIDENT to the Secretary of the Treasury, authorizing him to borrow $14,000,000, in which the Secretary is cautioned to keep in view the two several acts authorizing the loans, and the distinct conditions they contemplate. By the instructions of the PRESIDENT, the Secretary is authorized to apply the moneys. In the execution of the trust confided to him, the PRESIDENT generally directs him to employ Mr. Short to negotiate the loans, to borrow in the manner prescribed by the acts, and to discharge immediately the arrears of interest due to the French, to which purpose and to the complete payment of that debt the twelve million loan was altogether appropriated. If this money, then, was shown to have been drawn here, it was neither warranted by law nor by the PRESIDENT's instructions. The Secretary did begin to draw as early as 1790, and had continued to draw from time to time, till 1793, without giving notice of this to the Legislature. Having shown that the Secretary had drawn without authority to draw, he next proceeded to consider the purpose of those drafts.

The money thus drawn for was not, he stated, applied to the purchase of the Public Debt. No money obtained from foreign loans was thus applied until this year; the domestic resources appropriated to this object were never exhausted. These were the facts involved in the first resolution, which he wished to establish. Before he proceeded further into the discussion, he wished to hear what gentlemen had to say to controvert them. He wished to see justice done in the matter before the House; he wished justice, also, to be tempered with moderation and mercy; and if gentlemen could show the necessity for deviations from positive law, which he had endeavored to point out, it would exonerate the Secretary from a very great share of blame.

Mr. BARNWELL called for the reading of certain parts of the two acts authorizing the loans. One, of the 4th of August, authorizes a loan of $12,000,000, to be obtained without limitation as to the interest, for the purpose of paying the Foreign debt; the other is of the 12th of August, for $2,000,000, the interest to be not more than five per cent., and for the purpose of reducing the Domestic debt.

Mr. SEDGWICK, to disprove that the drafts alluded to had been made without the knowledge of the Legislature, called for the reading of the Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

[H. or R.]

PRESIDENT'S Speech to both Houses on the 8th of December, 1790, and a subsequent report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the same point. By this, it appeared that the power of borrowing having been exercised under the joint authority of the two acts, the Secretary states a difficulty that had occurred to him on the subject of the drafts alluded to. The money having been obtained on an interest of five per cent., exclusive of douceurs, he wished the Legislature to determine whether it might strictly be considered as borrowed under the second act, which limited the interest at five per cent. This was sufficient, he conceived, to show that the Legislature were not ignorant of those drafts, and an act was passed solving the Secretary's doubt, and sanctioning his construction of the law.

Mr. GILES remarked, that he had drawn before that sanction was obtained.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, on the first charge in the resolution, that, as the interest of the money borrowed in Europe is payable where borrowed, it was economical in the Secretary to pay that interest with moneys there, which were to be drawn here, and replace the sum by taking the amount from the funds here destined for that payment. A financial operation of this nature is simple, and saves the trouble of drawing with one hand and remitting with the other. He conceived there was no just foundation for the first charge.

Mr. LAURANCE said, that when the resolutions calling for information from the Treasury Department were first brought forward, the public mind was impressed with an idea that there were moneys unaccounted for. This charge is now dropped, and it is honorable to the officer concerned that, after much probing, nothing is found to support it. The inquiry now is, whether a debt was paid out of this or that fund. He did not admit the fact, that it was paid out of any other moneys than what law strictly warranted. He went into a history of the subject from its origin. He stated the nature and purposes of the loans. There was nothing to prevent the PRESIDENT from consolidating the two loans, provided such an arrangement did not interfere with the purposes intended by them. The PRESIDENT employed the Secretary to obtain the loans under the joint authority of both acts, as it was found that the object could best be carried into effect by such an arrangement.

The money thus borrowed became subject to the appropriations of both acts, and not exclusively for the payment of the Foreign debt. Then, as part of that money was subject to be drawn here for the redemption of the Domestic debt, and the interest of the loan was to be paid with Domestic funds, it was perfectly reasonable to avoid further drafts and remittances to pay the debt there with money there, and replace it here with money already here. The fact stated in the first part of the resolution is, by this plain statement of the case, substantially refuted, and appears altogether unfounded; but if the fact is proved, what is implied? No injury to the interests of the community; the intention of the Legislature has been in every point fulfilled. If the Secretary had acted differently, he would have been guilty of an absurdity, and to blame for sacrificing the public interest and neglecting the spirit of a law for a strict and unprofitable observance of its letter.

Mr. SEDGWICK, by adverting to the Speech of the PRESIDENT and Report of the Secretary, had shown that the Legislature had been made acquainted with the drafts, and sanctioned future ones on the same principles. The latter part of the first resolution criminales the Secretary for making them without instructions from the PRESIDENT. Even if this was the case, he did not know whether this was really reprehensible. He defended it on the ground, that the Secretary is the officer appointed by law to superintend the finances and apply all moneys agreeably to appropriations. He took a view of the subject, as stated by Mr. LAURANCE, and concluded by asking, whether, if the Secretary was found, on a critical examination, to have deviated in a trifle from the letter of the law, such a deviation was sufficient to warrant the alarm's being sounded from St. Croix to St. Mary's, and whether the precious time of the House, at the close of the session, should be taken up in so unprofitable and frivolous an investigation?

Mr. GILES said, the transaction alluded to by the gentlemen to controvert the fact laid down in the first part of the resolution before the Committee was not immaterial, as they had endeavored to show it. It was not merely a financial operation to avoid the necessity of drawing and remitting. The truth was, that the Secretary had drawn over nearly $3,000,000. The PRESIDENT's authority was limited to $2,000,000.

Mr. LAURANCE was of opinion, that if the PRESIDENT, or his agent, had drawn the whole amount of the money obtained under both loans, he could not be said to have gone beyond his authority. He was authorized to borrow $12,000,000 to pay the arrears on the Foreign debt, and to modify the whole. In the execution of this trust, he might have found it advisable to draw to the country the whole of that sum. It had been found advisable to draw for part, and to pay the French by shipping produce to St. Domingo. If the money expended for supplies to St. Domingo is deducted, the balance will be found less than $2,000,000.

Mr. L. contended, that the interest of the moneys borrowed was not paid out of the principal of the loan, as set forth in the first charge of the resolution before the Committee. If gentlemen would attend to the history of the transaction, they would find this strictly true. This interest was paid out of the moneys borrowed for the redemption of the Public Debt, and not out of those intended to pay the French, and the funds appropriated for the payment of that interest were here to replace the former and be applied as those were appropriated. He referred to the PRESIDENT'S Speeches at the commencement of the two last sessions, to show that the loan was obtained under the joint authority of both acts; and adverted to the act of Congress, in consequence of a doubt suggested by the Secretary, explaining that the moneys first obtained might be considered as borrowed under the act authorizing the loan. Having shown the first charge in the resolution to be unfounded, he turned to the second.

The Secretary is accused of drawing moneys to this country without instructions. In this transaction, the President must be considered as the principal, and the Secretary the agent, or the Secretary must be looked upon as the principal. If the President is the principal, and he be authorized to obtain the loans, as soon as the money is obtained it naturally falls under the direction of the financier; but if it be contended that the President was to have applied the moneys as well as to borrow them, then we have nothing to do with the agent; that agent is accountable to his principal, and as this principal is not called to an account by the Legislature for any improper exercise of discretion, he must be considered as having acted strictly within the law. If the Secretary is considered as the principal (and by a strict attention to the law, he believed, it would be found so, for the President is by it authorized to borrow, and it is not expressed who shall apply the money) then it was not one of the duties of the Secretary to procure the instructions of the President, being the principal, and consequently having the direction of the money borrowed, he is made the judge of the time of drawing, to fulfil the intention of the law. Was the money, he asked, to have remained in the hands of the banker in Europe? Since it was borrowed for the purchase of the Public Debt, the sooner it was drawn over the better, and the Secretary having the direction of those moneys, could do it without consulting the President. He proceeded to show, however, that the Secretary had by no means acted entirely without regard to the President's instructions. His letter to Mr. Short, which had been read, expressly says, that he is waiting for instructions from the President, and the only instructions brought forward clearly shows, that he did not act without them. On this occasion it was not necessary, he conceived, that all the private communications between those two officers should be brought forward; indeed many of the instructions might have been verbal, and of a private nature. Another proof lies before the Committee, to show that the Secretary did not act independent of instructions. A Report of the Secretary mentions that some matters relative to the loans were under consideration of the President of the UNITED STATES. This document, the gentlemen were in possession of when they framed the resolutions; and it, in his opinion, left very little ground indeed to suppose that the Secretary had acted without instructions.

That officer, he contended, had strictly obeyed the Appropriation law; he had not drawn one dollar that the act did not warrant. On the authority of one act, the Secretary drew two millions (by the by he wished to remark, that the Secretary is not the officer who actually draws, who sells the bills, or who receives the money; this falls within the province of the Treasurer, the Secretary does not touch a penny of those moneys) to apply to the reduction of the Public Debt. The other act gave the President power to draw every dollar of the loan it established, if he thought fit, if those who were to receive the money wished to be paid here. Will the remittance which afforded so seasonable a relief to St. Domingo be found fault with? If this mode of paying was within the authority vested in the President, surely the power of drawing must have accompanied it. He concluded by observing, that he had stated his ideas on the subject in a hasty manner, for the want of time to go more fully into the discussion.

Mr. MERCER next rose. None of the communications from the Secretary of the Treasury had removed his suspicions relative to the transactions of that Department. What had fallen in the course of the discussion, had not removed his doubts. He confessed himself more at a loss than ever to account for the conduct of that officer. To judge of the propriety of his conduct, it was necessary to consider what his duties are, and investigate whether a necessity existed to justify the drawing complained of. Gentlemen, in their arguments, had alluded to some observations that had fallen from him on other occasions expressive of his opinion, that there had been corruption in that Department. This opinion he still entertained. He suggested that some irregularities had taken place as to the money appropriated to the Sinking Fund. This might be the fact, and his suspicions were sufficiently urgent to warrant him in suggesting that it might be possible. At the close of 1792, he stated there was a balance of cash in the Treasury of $2,331,182, and the bonds due in the course of the present year would produce a sum of about $2,269,000. Yet a proposition was made in the House, predicated on a total want of money in the Treasury, to borrow $800,000 in addition to the $400,000 already borrowed of the Bank.

[Here Mr. BODINOT interrupted the member, as being out of order. The Chairman, conceiving Mr. MERCER's remarks to be introductory to, and connected with the observations he intended to make on the resolution, declared him in order.]

Mr. MERCER proceeded to show, by sundry statements and calculations, that there was no necessity for this loan of $800,000. The House, he said, to discharge their duty, should be satisfied how the money appropriated was applied, before they consented to repeated additional appropriations. When calls for information had been made by the House, with a view to comply with their indispensable duty, the Secretary had thought it sufficient to balance money actually received, by calculations of sums that would probably be wanted agreeably to appropriations. Were dollars, he asked, to be balanced by absolute appropriations? Can things certain be balanced by things uncertain? Actual expenditure would alone balance actual receipt. Appropriations founded only on uncertain calculations could not show the money actually laid out. He adverted to some calculations made to ascertain the probable expenses of the War Department.

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

[Here the member was again called to order, and was declared out of order by the Chairman.] Mr. M. confined his observation more immediately to the resolution before the Committee. It had been said, that the interest paid was paid out of moneys that were to be drawn to this country, and were replaced here by funds from the domestic resources originally appropriated for that object, and that the dead letter of the law, if any part of it, had alone been violated. He contended there had been an essential violation.

The sums drawn for and appropriated to reduce the Public Debt, were not applied to that purpose; the domestic resources appropriated to that object, never were exhausted. If this is the case, conclusions surely unfavorable to that officer must naturally follow.

He proceeded to make some remarks on the question, whether the Secretary had acted under instructions from the President. It was disagreeable, he premised, to criminate the character of any officer. He bore a great respect for the President, for his virtues, talents, and services, but however grating to his feelings it might be to find fault with any part of his conduct in this matter, he was unable to discharge his duty under his present impressions, unless he avowed that he conceived that officer had violated the law, though he allowed, without intention, by not inquiring into the subject, while transacting, as it was his duty to do. He must declare that he saw no proof that the Secretary had acted under the President's instructions. On the contrary, he saw the reverse, there was even no presumptive proof of the fact. The House had called for information as to the extent of the authority delegated by the President to the Secretary. Either the Secretary has produced the proof of this authority, or he has not complied with the order of the House; it does appear that he has gone beyond it in making the drafts complained of. The President directed that the proceeds of the loan be immediately applied to pay the French; yet a great portion of that money was brought over here. It was said, that he might have brought the whole here if he chose, and paid it to the French here. This argument goes on the presumption that the President might do wrong without incurring blame. But the President expressly directed it to be paid immediately to France; and the House had no right to presume that he did direct the money to be drawn here, when proof to the contrary appears. Upon the whole, he concluded that the law had been broken in letter and substance, and that the Secretary had acted without proper instructions from the President.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed, that the charge against the Treasury Department was at first well calculated to beget serious alarm. When misapplications of the public money are sounded in the public ear, all feel interested, knowing, that what affects the public purse, must in a degree affect the purses of each private individual. In the present stage of the subject, he was happy in being able to facilitate himself and his fellow-citizens, that even should the whole of the charges contained in the resolutions be proved, it would not appear that they had lost a farthing by the conduct so loudly complained of. What is the charge? That the Secretary has paid an interest that was justly due; why then, he presumed, we should not have it again to pay. If the Secretary has paid what was due, what then is the complaint? It was surely not intended, that it should not have been paid. This was not the intention of Congress; for they passed an act providing funds for its payment. The Secretary was then right to pay it. But it is said, he paid with the wrong money. He saw no harm in not paying it with the very dollars appropriated, and approved of the operation, which saved drawing with the one hand and remitting with the other; in this there was no crime committed, no loss incurred. It appears, on the contrary, that something was gained by it. So far, then, he was clear, no law had been violated, nor was any rule of propriety departed from. He then touched upon the Secretary's disputed right to draw. He contended, that he had that right. The loans were obtained under the joint authority of the two acts. It was said that more than two millions, the amount appropriated for the Sinking Fund, were drawn over; but, he insisted, he might have drawn the other twelve millions, if it had been for the public interest so to do. The French wished to be paid here, and it being no loss but rather a profit to comply with their wish, where was the harm in so doing? If any public loss had been incurred owing to these drafts, then blame would lie. He concluded, by expressing his hearty approbation of the conduct of the officer who is criminated by the resolutions, and declared it as his firm intention to give them his negative.

Mr. HILLHOUSE argued, that the interest paid, was not paid out of the $2,000,000 loan, and that the drafts were made agreeably to the directions of the President. He showed this by the documents which had been already referred to. He put in a clear point of view the propriety of avoiding the expense and risk of drafts and corresponding remittances, and concluded by giving his approbation to the conduct of the Secretary in the transactions complained of, and by expressing it, as his firm belief that a majority of the Committee, from the evidence before them, would undoubtedly be of opinion, that the charges brought forward are unfounded.

Mr. SEDGWICK rose to correct a mistake of Mr. MERCER's. That gentleman had asserted, that the Secretary had drawn on Europe, before the loan, obtained by the Commissioners under the old Government, was ratified. This was not the case. The loan had been ratified in pursuance of the provisions of the act authorizing it. The President in his Speech, December, 8, 1790, says, "that agreeably to the powers vested in him at the last session, the loans in Holland had been completed."

By existing acts of the Legislature, and from express communications from the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears, that all the moneys borrowed were deemed borrowed under the joint authority of both acts, and not to be solely appropriated for the payment of the Foreign Debt.

Mr. MERCER explained, that he had said, that the Secretary had drawn from the loan obtained under the authority of the old Government, before said loan was legalized by law. If the Legislature had the right to legalize it, they had the right to reject it.

Mr. LEE next rose. He observed that as he found himself under the necessity of differing from his friend who had moved the resolution, with whom he generally agreed in opinion, and was accustomed to act, he begged the attention of the Committee for a few minutes. To determine whether the Secretary of the Treasury had acted legally, it was necessary to examine whether the authority from the President and his subsequent instructions authorized him to consolidate the loans under the acts of the 4th and 12th August, 1790.

On this question Mr. L. observed, that there seemed to be no objection to such a construction, except that which arose from the difference of interest allowed by those acts. That the first loan was commenced without any regular authority by a company in Amsterdam, that it received its authenticity from the acceptance of the Secretary of the Treasury. The interest and discounts on this loan amounted to more than an interest of five per cent., which was the only premium contemplated by the act of the 12th of August. It could consequently be accepted only under the act of the 4th of August, which gave no limitation to the interest which was to be allowed. This money seemed therefore solely applicable to the payment of the Foreign Debt. From his report of the 24th of February, 1791, the Secretary himself seemed to have had this impression. Congress seemed also to have had this impression, as on the 3d of March following they passed an act authorizing the application of this loan to the object of the act of the 12th of August, 1790. After the 3d of March, 1791, therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to bring this money to America for the purposes of the Sinking Fund. The interest of the Foreign Debt becoming due, for which domestic revenues were pledged, he thought it prudent to pay that interest out of this loan, relying on the domestic revenues to replace it for the purposes of the Sinking Fund. This was a mode of bringing the money here, and he was not limited in his discretion as to the mode; and therefore had a right to follow that which appeared to him most advantageous. The paying of the foreign interest out of this loan was made after the 3d of March, 1791.

Mr. L. had no doubt as to the legality of all the proceedings relative to money drawn to this country subsequent to the third of March, 1791; even the moneys borrowed for the Foreign Debt, because an higher interest than five per cent. was stipulated for, on any of the subsequent loans, and because the President, in his instructions to the Secretary, leaves the mode of paying the Foreign Debt to his discretion. If he judged it for the advantage of the United States to bring this money, in the first place, to America, the legality of such a measure cannot be questioned, though the economy and wisdom of it may not be admitted.

On this point, Mr. L. acknowledged, that he had not time to examine minutely all the statements and reports of the Secretary to judge of those exigencies which induced the drawing of all the money which had been drawn to America.

Whether it had been consistent or not with the interest of the United States, Mr. L. was of opinion, that the Secretary had legally a right to bring all the money he had drawn for to America, except what was drawn prior to the third of March, 1791. This money was drawn out of the first loan; it was drawn as declared, for the Sinking Fund; the first loan, for the reasons before stated, could not be applied, and consequently till the act of the 3d of March, 1791, this money could not be legally drawn for the Sinking Fund. Perhaps this act caused the irregularity of this proceeding.

But is not the Secretary of the Treasury subject to blame? Mr. L. observed, he thought he was not altogether free from it. At the meeting of Congress on the 8th day of December, 1790, the President in his Speech informed both Houses, that the first loan had been accepted, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had directions to lay the particulars before them. But what did he do? On the 15th of December following, he began to draw money on account of this loan to America, for the Sinking Fund; though from his Report on the 24th of February, 1791, he appears to have had a doubt as to the legality of this proceeding. He delayed giving information, in conformity to the President's Speech, till a few days before the dissolution of Congress. This conduct, Mr. L. said, seemed to argue a distrust of the Legislative Councils. Mr. L. dilated on the necessity of the purest and most confidential communication between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Legislature, and said, though he could not agree to the resolution then under consideration, there was one, subsequent to it, relating to this point, which he was sorry to find himself under the necessity of voting for.

Mr. BOUNDINOT considered it as the duty of the Committee in the discussion of the charges brought forward to confine themselves strictly to the points in question. The present examination differed from ordinary Legislative business. Specific charges are brought forward against a highly responsible officer; the facts brought forward to support those charges should be understood and considered, to form a right judgment on them. The Secretary is charged with having violated a law, by paying the interest due on a loan out of the principal of that loan. He went into some statements and calculations to show that the money paid on account of foreign loans, as stated in official documents, could not have been paid on account of interest of the late loans, from the disproportion of the sums.

He need say nothing more, he conceived, to show that the first charge in the resolution immediately before the Committee is unfounded. If what he said was not sufficient to disprove it, he asked where is the evidence to support it?

He next turned to the second charge in the resolution, viz: that the Secretary had made the drafts complained of without the President's instructions. Here he noticed a mistake some gentlemen had fallen into, when speaking of the call of the House for information. This was a request to the President, and not an order to the Secretary. From the information communicated in consequence of this call, it did not appear that the Secretary had acted without, or contrary to instructions, and he insisted, that he ought to be presumed innocent till he was proved guilty.

He argued, that the authority given to the President in the subject put it in his power to draw the whole fourteen millions to this country, if he thought fit; it could not, therefore, be contended, he insisted, that the amount of the drafts had passed the limits of the authority given. It is not denied, he proceeded, that there was a right to draw for the two millions appropriated for the reduction of the Public Debt. Well, it has appeared, on a certain occasion to the House, that our Minister in France negotiated a contract with the National Assembly, or their officers, for the payment of $800,000 of the debt due them, here; then certainly, the exigency of the case required that this sum should be drawn here for the purchase of provisions for St. Domingo, in which this payment was to be made. Here then was a positive necessity of drawing for $2,800,000, and as a discretionary power in the subject had been left to the Executive, they might have found it advisable, perhaps, under an expectation of additional payments in the same manner, to have drawn over as much more as they might have thought prudent.

He adverted to the application of the Secretary to the Legislature to declare whether the loan obtained, for an interest of five per cent., exclusive of discounts, might be considered as borrowed under authority of the $2,000,000 act. It was his (Mr. BOUNDINOT's) opinion at the time, that no explanatory law was necessary; and that the Executive had power to construe the act in that sense. This was also the Secretary's opinion, and in consequence of that opinion he had drawn bills. He thought it however right to apply to the House and have every doubt removed, and the Legislature sanctioned his construction of the law.

It had been said, that if the Legislature had a right to confirm, they also had a right to reject the construction put upon the law by the Executive. This, he conceived, they would not have been warranted in doing, after a contract agreeably to that construction had been made; such a proceeding must have involved a breach of contract.

It had been repeatedly asserted and strenuously insisted on, that the Legislature were totally in the dark, as to the drafts from Europe. To disprove this assertion, he read several items from sundry Reports of the Secretary, where sums received on account of loans are specified. It had also been said, that there was no evidence that any part of the loan was applied to or intended for the purchase of the Public Debt.

This also appears unfounded, from a note dated 25th of August, 1790, laid before the Trustees for purchasing the Public Debt, which expressly mentions, that a loan had been negotiated, part of which was destined for the purchase of the Public Debt, and that some points relative thereto were before the President for his approbation. This also showed that the President had knowledge of such intentions. His Speech, and the Report of the Secretary, in consequence of part of that Speech, which had been so repeatedly referred to, also unequivocally prove this point.

He recapitulated the heads of his arguments, and concluded, that if nothing further could be brought in support of the charges now before the Committee, they should have his decided negative.

Mr. MADISON.—He wished not, he said, to waste a moment of the small portion of time left, by regretting its insufficiency for a full discussion of the subject before the Committee. But he thought it due to truth, and to the honorable and independent motives of his colleague [Mr. GILES] in proposing the resolutions, to remark, that the lateness of the day to which they had been postponed did not justify the strictures which had been made on it. If the delay was not to be considered as unavoidable, some blame, at least, would fall elsewhere. The inquiries in which the whole matter originated, had been moved by his colleague, and passed the House some weeks ago. The Reports in answer to these inquiries had not been finally made and printed a single day before the present resolutions were submitted to the House. He admitted that it might have been impracticable to report the information called for, as early as was desired by the House. He was sensible of the anxiety that would be naturally felt by the Officer called upon, to present every consideration that might place his conduct in the most favorable point of view; yet with all these allowances, it was impossible to deny that the Reports contained things which did not belong to them, and therefore consumed time which belonged to the period for discussion. He would mention one instance on which there could not possibly be a difference of opinion, viz: the vindication, formally undertaken by the Secretary, of the policy of borrowing money abroad. Whether this policy was right or wrong, the Legislature had themselves decided in favor of it; and it was the duty of the Secretary, in complying with the orders of the House, to inform the House how the law had been executed—not why it had been made; to explain his own conduct, not to justify that of the Legislature.

It had been asked why the call for information had not been sooner made? The answer was obvious and simple. It was not sooner perceived by the House, that there was such a necessity for it. The want of information was first suggested by the bill for paying $2,000,000 to the Bank, although $200,000 only were immediately due, and for authorizing another foreign loan to the amount of $2,000,000. From the dawn of light thrown by some circumstances incident to the occasion, on the darkness in which the House had remained, proceeded those doubts and inquiries which had led to the information now possessed. His colleague had great merit in having brought about this development. He had rendered a service highly valuable to the Legislature, and no less important and acceptable to the public. One good effect of the information had been, that it prevented the passage of the bill for borrowing $2,000,000 as an anticipated payment to the Bank. The bill had dropped from the hand of its patron with the first light that broke in upon the House. What other measures would have been prevented or varied, if a like knowledge of our funds and finances had been sooner obtained, was matter of serious consideration.

Another consequence of the Reports, taken together, was, that the face of them presented to his colleague an evidence of the charges contained in the resolutions. Whether, at so late a day, it was best to leave the subject as exhibited by the various documents in print, for the examination and opinion of the public, or to press it on every member had a right to decide for himself. His colleague had viewed the positions stated in his motion as too important to be suspended, and as supported by such clear and authentic proofs, that a small portion of time would suffice for the subject. Under this impression, what was his right became his duty; and he had discharged it by offering his resolutions to the House.

As the House had refused to commit the two introductory resolutions, which established the rule of judgment to be applied to the case, and the last also, which declared the inference to be drawn, the task of the Committee was limited to a simple inquiry into the facts stated. They were to make out and report a special verdict of these, and leave it to the House to pronounce the proper judgment arising from them.

The resolution immediately before the Committee imported, "that the Secretary of the Treasury had violated the law passed on the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys," first, "by applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of interest on that principal;" secondly, "by drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instruction of the President."

The questions here are questions of fact; and whatever quality may be attached by different gentlemen to the several facts, it would seem as if the facts themselves are too clearly supported by the Reports of the Secretary, and the documents attending them, to be denied or controverted.

The law of August 4, 1790, authorized the President to cause to be borrowed $2,000,000, to be applied to the Foreign Debt of the United States. A subsequent law of August 12, 1790, authorized another loan of $2,000,000, to be applied to the Domestic Debt of the United States. A power to make these loans was delegated, on the 28th of August, 1790, to the Secretary, by a general commission, in the usual form, referring to the several acts above mentioned, but without any further discrimination of the loans to be made. As the law, however, for applying loans to the foreign object was prior in date, the presumption would rather be, that it was to have a priority of execution; that the first money borrowed was to belong to the first object provided for. It was unnecessary, however, to dwell on this consideration, because the President had removed all uncertainty by the precise explanations and instructions which accompanied the power to the Secretary, and which ought, in truth, to be deemed a part of the commission. The instruction having been more than once read to the Committee, he would content himself with referring to it.

The part referred to is in the following words: "I do hereby make known to you that, in the execution of the said trust, you are to observe and follow the orders and directions following, viz: Except where otherwise especially directed by me, you shall employ in the negotiation of any loan or loans which may be made in any foreign country, William Short, Esq.; you shall borrow, or cause to be borrowed, on the best terms which shall be found practicable, and within the limitations prescribed by law as to time of repayment and rate of interest, such sum or sums as shall be sufficient to discharge, as well all instalments or parts of the principal of the Foreign Debt, which are now due, or shall become payable to the end of the year 1791, as all interest and arrears of interest which now are, or shall become due, in respect to the said Debt, to the same end of the year 1791. And you shall apply, or cause to be applied, the moneys which shall be so borrowed, with all convenient despatch, to the payment of the said instalments, and parts of the principal and interest, and arrears of interest of the said Debt. You shall not extend the amount of the loan which you shall make, or cause to be made, beyond the sum which shall be necessary for completing such payment, unless it can be done upon terms more advantageous to the United States, than those upon which the residue of the said Debt shall stand or be. But if the said residue, or any part of the same, can be paid off by new loans, upon terms of advantage to the United States, you shall cause such further loans as may be requisite to be made, and the proceeds thereof to be applied accordingly. And for carrying into effect the objects and purposes aforesaid, I do hereby further empower you to make, or cause to be made, with whomsoever it may concern, such contract or contracts, being of a nature relative thereto, as shall be found needful and conducive to the interest of the United States."

By this formal act, issued along with the commission to the Secretary, the President designated the object to which the loans to be made were to be applied; and by declaring the object to be that provided for by the act of August 4, 1790, he expressly placed the loan under the authority and provision of that act; so that the moment the money should be borrowed, it was to stand legally appropriated to its specified object—as much as if another law authorizing another loan for another purpose, had not existed.

This arrangement of the President was the more proper, not only because provision for the payment of the Foreign Debt had been the primary object of the Legislature, and the payment of the French debt, the anxious wish of their constituents, but because payments to France were no longer matter of option, but of strict and positive obligation on the United States. In proof of this, he stated that the debt to France, calculated to the end of 1791, and computing the livre at 54-10 to a dollar, amounted to $4,814,814, whilst the payments actually made, computing the florin at 2½ to a dollar, amounted to more than $3,372,717, leaving, as a balance, at the end of 1791, $1,442,097. Adding to this balance the instalments due for 1792, amounting to $638,888, there were to be paid within that year $2,080,985. The entire payments, however, composed of $656,500 in Europe, and $726,000 put to the account of St. Domingo, (although $444,263 83 were actually paid,) amounted to $1,382,500, leaving due at the end of 1792, a balance of $698,485.

Here Mr. M. adverted to and read a paragraph in the Report of the Secretary, page 16, where in allusion to the measure of drawing bills in the latter part of 1792, he says: "I feel myself the more at liberty to do it, because it did not interfere with a complete fulfilment of the public engagements in regard to the Foreign Debt. It could be done consistently with a full reimbursement of all arrears and instalments which had accrued on account of that Debt."

Mr. M. observed, that, as he could not reconcile this paragraph with the calculations which he had stated, and which were drawn from official documents, he must regard it as an unquestionable error, produced by some hasty view of the subject.

Returning to the Commission, Mr. M. repeated that all the money which that instrument defined and qualified by the instruction annexed to it, authorized the Secretary to borrow, was actually and specifically appropriated to the payment of the Foreign Debt, and under circumstances particularly urgent, in relation to a part of it.

In what manner had this trust been carried into execution? It was to be observed, with regret, that, on the very day on which the commission and instruction issued from the President, the Secretary commenced his arrangement for diverting part of a loan, accepted and ratified by virtue of his commission, to a purpose different from that specified and required by his instruction. That a fact of so extraordinary a complexion might be grounded on the most unexceptionable proof, Mr. M. said he should take the liberty of supporting it by the authority of the Secretary himself. Here he read from the Secretary's Letter, dated August 28, 1790, to the Dutch houses from whom the Loan had been accepted, the following passages, viz:

"I should also wish, for particular reasons, that the business may be so regulated as to give it the form of two loans—one for two millions under the first act, and the other for one million under the second. But neither about this, am I so solicitous as to be willing that it should constitute an embarrassment."

"I destine a million and a half of this sum as a payment to France, under the direction of Mr. Short, our Chargé d'Affaires at that Court, whose orders for that purpose you will please to follow."

The aspect here presented by a comparison of the several documents, was singular and remarkable. The subordinate Officer appeared in direct opposition to the Chief Magistrate. The agent was seen overruling, by his own orders, the orders of his principal. The language of the President was "By virtue of the power vested in me by law, I destine the money to be borrowed to the discharge of the instalments and interest of the Foreign Debt." The language of the Secretary was: "I destine a part of the money only to that purpose, and a part to be brought to the United States for other purposes." He left every member to make his own reflections on the subject. He would only observe, in general, that it demonstrated the truth asserted in the proposition that the Secretary had violated both the law of August 4, 1790, and the instruction of the President relating to it.

He then proceeded to a more distinct view of the two points particularly stated in the resolution. The first was, "That a certain portion of the principal borrowed under the act of August 4, 1790, had been applied to the payment of the interest falling due on that principal." As the fact would not, he presumed, be denied, he forebore to quote that part of the documents which admitted and authenticated it. He would, however, premise to any observations on it, a cursory view of the nature of appropriations.

It was unnecessary to repeat the emphatic remarks on this subject, which had fallen from the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FINDLAY.] It was sufficiently understood. He concluded that appropriations of money were of a high and sacred character; that they were the great bulwark which our Constitution had carefully and jealously established against Executive usurpations. He meant only to take notice of the different plans into which appropriations might be moulded, and of the particular operation which ought to be given to them.

One of the plans was that of appropriating specified funds to specified objects, in which the supposed certainty of the funds was adjusted to the supposed importance of the objects.

The other plan formed all the branches of revenue into an aggregate fund, on which the several objects should have a priority of claim according to their superiority of importance. It was evident that in both these cases, the Legislature alone possessed the competent authority. The exclusive right of that Department of the Government to make the proper regulations, was the basis of the utility and efficacy of appropriations.

There was a third question incident to the doctrine of appropriations, viz: Whether, under specific appropriations, such as had been adopted by Congress, the Executive authority could, without special permission of the law, apply the excess of one fund to the aid of a deficient one, or borrow from one fund for the object of another. On this question, there might perhaps be a difference of opinion. He would only remark, that, admitting such a discretion to be implied in the trust of executing the laws, it would still be requisite that the due sanction of the Executive should be given, that a regular account should be kept between the different funds, and that all advances from one to the other should be replaced as soon as possible. This was equally necessary to the preservation of order in the public finances, and to a proper respect for the authority of the laws.

In the present case, it did not appear that the moneys taken at different times from the Loans designated by the PRESIDENT, and thereby placed under the appropriation of the act of August 4, 1790, to the Foreign Debt, had ever been replaced. It did not appear that any such replacement was regularly planned or provided for. It was particularly worthy of observation, moreover, that the only use within the United States for which any loan in Europe could be assigned, was that of the Sinking Fund; that the Trustees of this Fund had never been even informed of the drafts; that if the moneys drawn had been carried to the Sinking Fund, the limited sum of $2,000,000 would have been exceeded; and that the statements and accounts had, in fact, been so wound up, as mentioned by the Secretary, that not a single dollar of the money laid out in purchasing the Public Debt had been charged on loans drawn into the United States, although such was the only purpose to which they were legally applicable, and such the principal reason assigned for making the drafts.

He did not go into a particular proof that the sum drawn into the United States, after subtracting the whole sum placed to a foreign account, exceeded the sum of $2,000,000, because the fact had been conceded on the other side, particularly by the statement of the member from Connecticut, [MR. HULLHOUSE.]

Thus it appeared clearly, in confirmation of the first point, that the application of a certain portion of the principal borrowed in Europe, to payment of the interest, was not a mere transposition of moneys, to prevent the sending them backwards or forwards, nor an advance of money from an overflowing fund in favor of a deficient one; but an absolute diversion of appropriated money, and consequently a violation of the law making appropriation.

The second point in the resolution related to the drawing of moneys into the United States without the instruction of the PRESIDENT. This point had been fully established by the documents and explanations applied to the first. They had done more: they had demonstrated that the instructions of the PRESIDENT, which dedicated the loans to be made under his commission, to a foreign object, were an express prohibition of drafts for any domestic object. It was sufficient, therefore, to refer to the instructions of the PRESIDENT, and to the contradictory steps taken by the Secretary. Two attempts had been made to elude the force of these official proofs. The first appealed to the PRESIDENT'S Speech at the opening of the session in 1790; to the Report of the Secretary, made in consequence of it, to the House; and to the supplementary act of Congress passed in conformity to the Report.

Had the circumstances involved in this transaction been attended to by those who seemed to rely on it, Mr. M. was persuaded that a reference to it would never have been made by gentlemen on that side. As they had thought fit, however, to draw arguments from that source, it was proper to give an answer to them; and the best answer would be a naked statement of facts.

The instruction of the PRESIDENT to the Secretary was given, as has been seen, on the 28th of August, 1790. The Letter of the Secretary contravening this instruction, was dated, as has also been seen, on the same 28th day of August, 1790. The actual drawing of bills by the Secretary commenced the 15th of December, 1790. The law now pleaded in justification of the conduct of the Secretary, passed on the 3d of March, 1791.

There are other facts material to a correct and full view of the subject. The Speech of the PRESIDENT was delivered on the 8th of December, 1790. It briefly informed the two Houses that "a loan of 3,000,000 of florins, towards which some provisional measures had previously taken place, had been completed in Holland," and "that the Secretary of the Treasury had discretion to communicate such further particulars as might be requisite for more precise information." The consequent Report of the Secretary, recommending the provision in the supplementary act, was not received till the 25th of February, 1791—six days only before the constitutional dissolution of the House. In the interval between the Speech of the PRESIDENT and the Secretary's Report, he had proceeded to draw bills to the amount of 793,392 florins. His Report, notwithstanding what had been said of it, contained not a word from which it could be known that a single florin had been actually drawn over to the United States.

The other attempt to elude the evidence before the Committee, recoiled with equal force on the gentlemen who had hazarded it. In the report lately made by the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, is a statement laid before them by the Secretary, in which it is noted "that the acceptance of the loan of 3,000,000 of florins, and the application of one-third of it to the purpose of that Fund, was under the consideration of the PRESIDENT." From this fact, it had been inferred, not only that the Secretary had withheld no proper information from the Trustees, but that the result of the PRESIDENT'S deliberations on the subject had varied the purpose signified by his first instructions to the Secretary.

It happened, however, most unfortunately for the gentlemen who exulted in this argument, that they had entirely overlooked the dates of the two papers. The paper laid before the Trustees, and alleged to have explained the final purpose of the PRESIDENT, was dated on the 25th of August, 1790. The paper relied on by the other side, as the final, as well as the most formal, designation of the will of the PRESIDENT, was dated the 28th of August, 1790. The gentlemen, therefore, instead of the inference they had made, should have reversed their premises, and joined with their opponents in concluding that the PRESIDENT was led by a consideration of the subject, not to do what the Secretary, in his note to the Trustees, seemed to anticipate, but what had been evinced by the PRESIDENT'S own act of posterior date.

The second point, then, as well as the first, rests

MARCH, 1793.]

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

on the most solid proofs, taken from a collective view of authentic documents.

Much has been said on the necessity of some-times departing from the strictness of legal appropriations, as a plea for any freedoms that may have been taken with them by the Secretary. He would not deny that there might be emergencies, in the course of human affairs, of so extraordinary and pressing a nature, as to absolve the Executive from an inflexible conformity to the injunctions of the law. It was, nevertheless, as essential to remember, as it was obvious to remark, that in all such cases, the necessity should be palpable; that the Executive sanction should flow from the supreme source; and that the first opportunity should be seized for communicating to the Legislature the measures pursued, with the reasons explaining the necessity of them. This early communication was equally enforced by prudence and by duty. It was the best evidence of the motives for assuming the extraordinary power; it was a respect manifestly due to the Legislative authority; and it alone would enable the Legislature, by a provident amendment of the law, to accommodate it to like emergencies in future.

In the proceedings falling under the present inquiry, no necessity appeared for the liberties which had been taken, the money appropriated in Europe being more wanted there than at home. It appeared that the instructions of the Supreme Executive, instead of warranting those liberties, had precluded them; nor had the proper explanations been disclosed in due time to the Legislature. To place the subject in a more distinct point of view, it was proper to advert to the precise authorities and duties of the Secretary, as his office is defined by the act establishing the Treasury Department. For this purpose, Mr. M. read the second section of that act, which is in the words following:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and the public expenditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts and making returns, and to grant, under the limitations herein established, or to be hereafter provided, all warrants for moneys to be issued from the Treasury, in pursuance of appropriations by law; to execute such services relative to the sale of the lands belonging to the United States as may be by law required of him; to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, (as he may be required,) respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and generally to perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform."

This establishment of the office evidently had no reference beyond the case of superintending the regular and ordinary collection of the revenue, and granting warrants for moneys issued from the Treasury, in pursuance of appropriations by law.

The case of loans, as an occasional and extraordinary resource, was left to be provided for by particular laws for the purpose. The authority, with respect to the loans in question, was accordingly committed to the PRESIDENT, in order to secure for so special a trust, the highest responsibility to be found in the Government. And when it was considered that the whole sum contemplated was no less than fourteen millions of dollars, and when the latitude as to the terms and contracts was combined with the vastness of the sum, it might well be questioned whether so great a power would have been delegated to any man in whom the Legislature and the people of America had less confidence than they so justly reposed in the existing Chief Magistrate, and whether an equal power will ever be committed to a successor.

This distinction between the case of ordinary revenue and that of loans is not only consonant to the actual policy of our laws, but is founded in obvious and solid considerations. In the collection and disbursement of the ordinary revenues arising from taxation, the business flows in official channels, is subject in every stage to official checks, and the money, being in constant influx and efflux, nowhere accumulates in immense sums. The case of loans is, in all these respects, different. In settling the terms and arranging the negotiations, there is always an important discretion involved. When the loans are foreign, as well as great, regulations concerning the bills of exchange form another occasion where great latitude is implied in the trust; whilst the magnitude of the sums, falling under the same direction at the same moment, present a further and material variance between the two cases. The tendency of these observations is to show that, as the permanent law establishing the Treasury Department does not extend the authority of the Secretary to the case of loans, and as the law authorizing loans exacts, for special reasons, a responsibility from the PRESIDENT himself, the authority of the Secretary, in executing the loans, and the appropriation of them, must be derived from the PRESIDENT; and, consequently, where that authority fails, there can be no resort to the law establishing the Department, much less to any general discretion incident to his official character.

It is evident that the PRESIDENT, although no doubt guided by the most proper considerations in employing the agency of the Secretary of the Treasury in the business of the loans, might, if he had judged fit, have substituted the agency of another; and that, whatever agency he might prefer, his own instructions would always regulate the extent and exercise of the power conferred. The want of any apparent authority from the PRESIDENT had led several gentlemen to insist on presumed authorities, superceding the instructions joined with the commission to the Secretary. But here, again, the fair inference was to be reversed. A communication of the authorities given by the PRESIDENT to the Secretary, as to the application of the foreign loans, had been expressly requested by the vote of the House. It was not to be supposed that the Secretary, if he had received further authorities or instructions, would have failed to produce them, or to refer to them, in the justification of his conduct. Far less could it be presumed that the PASSEMENT, if he had given any superceding authorities or instructions, would not have caused them to be communicated to the House, or that he would have suffered a partial communication to mislead the House into an error as to so important a fact. The PASSEMENT was the last man in the world to whom any measure whatever of a deceptive tendency could be credibly attributed.

Thus far (said Mr. M.) his observations had departed as little as possible from the question in its strictest sense. He should now avail himself of the opportunity afforded by the terms of the last clause, which spoke of drafts generally, to take a more particular notice of those recently made; in doing which, he considered himself safe within the Rules of the House, which were so rigorously enforced against the affirmative side of the question. The whole amount of foreign loans transferred directly or indirectly to the United States appeared from the several statements to be about $3,000,000. The amount of the direct drafts was $2,304,769 13. Of the drafts made since the 16th of April, 1792, and sold by the Bank, the proceeds now in the Bank, or payable into it, before the 1st of April next, amount to $1,220,476 01. Of this sum $310,000 have been drawn in the course of the present session of Congress. With respect to the times and the amount of these drafts, hitherto absolutely unknown to the Legislature, because the account of them had remained in the books of the Bank without ever appearing in the books of the Treasurer, Mr. M. confessed that he had found no explanations that were satisfactory to him. He had looked through the House, without discovering either that they had been made by the authority or with the knowledge of the PASSEMENT, or had been required for, or applied to the purchase of, the Public Debt, or had been ever communicated to the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, who had the direction of such purchases, or that they were the effect of any necessity that could justify them. And if there was no evident necessity for the proceeding, it was the more to be lamented that, whilst we were everywhere sympathizing with our allies in their arduous struggles for liberty, and echoing from every part of the Union, our congratulations and good wishes, the pecuniary success so critically necessary to their cause, and the most substantial proof of the sincerity of our professions, should be silently withdrawn across the Atlantic from the object for which they were intended—success, too, which were not merely a tribute of gratitude, of generosity, or of benevolent over of strict and positive obligation, for value acknowledged and received. In contemplating the subject in this point of view, he felt a pain which he could not easily express, and to which, he persuaded himself, the breast of no other member could be a stranger. Laying aside, however, all these unfavorable considerations, the important question still remained, why the Legislature had been uninformed of the moneys so unexpectedly drawn into the Bank, and to so very great an amount? If the drafts had received every requisite sanction, if they had been produced by the most justifiable causes, the existence of $1,220,476, in a situation so different from what had been contemplated, was a fact which the Representatives of the people had a right to know, which it was important to them and their constituents that they should know, and which it was the indispensable duty of the officer charged with it to have made known. This omission was the more remarkable when considered in relation to the measure above mentioned, of paying off at once the whole sum of $2,000,000, payable to the Bank by instalments in ten years. A bill for this purpose had been introduced, and was on its passage; the object of it had been patronized by a report of the Secretary not long since made. In one of his last reports he expressly states, among the inducements to such extensive drafts of money from Europe, that they were made "with an eye to placing within the reach of the Legislature" the means necessary for this object. Was it not extraordinary, was it not unaccountable, that so important a measure should be recommended, and be actually introduced, and that money otherwise appropriated in Europe should be transferred to this country and deposited in the Bank, in order that it might be within the reach of being applied by the Legislature to that measure, and yet that no disclosure should be made to the Legislature of the fact that the money was so drawn and lay at the Bank, within their reach, to be so applied? If anything could heighten astonishment on this occasion it must be the reason assigned by the Secretary for any obsecrity that might have hung over our finances—that, till the last resolutions, no call had been made on the Department which rendered it proper to exhibit a general view of the public moneys and funds, or to show the amount and situation of such as were unapplied. Mr. M. would not decide that the Legislature was free from blame in not using more full and efficacious means of obtaining such information as would have removed all obscurity. But, whatever degree of blame might fall on them, it never could be admitted that their calls on the Department had furnished no proper occasion for exhibiting a full view of the various resolutions, which, without the least force of construction, would have extended to every particular article of information. He reminded the Committee of the latitude of reports under certain other orders of the House, and asked whether less freedom of construction was to be allowed when information was to be given, than when power or discretion was to be exercised? But, independently of this view of the matter, Mr. M. held it to be clear and palpable that the very situation of the money afforded an occasion which rendered it proper that the House should be informed of it. If a liberty could be taken of removing money from Europe, where it stood appropriated by law, to this country, where there was no legal object that required it, and with an eye, as was stated, to an object to which no money was applicable, without the authority of the Legislature, how could it possibly be supposed improper to take the further liberty of communicating what was done to the Legislature? He concluded with recurring to the particular form in which the subject presented itself to the Committee, and repeating that, whatever quality might be attached to the facts charged, or however improper it might be thought by some to proceed in haste to any affirmative decision on them, it appeared irreconcilable with the evidence which had been produced, to decide, by a negative vote, against the truth of the facts.

Mr. Ames prefaced his remarks on the subject before the Committee by some observations on the nature of the charges brought forward. He was happy that they were determinate, and conceived that the defence could be crowded in a nutshell. As to the first charge in the resolution immediately before the Committee, he had seen no proof in support of it brought forward. It is founded only on assertion, and he conceived that contra-assertion was sufficient to meet it. No authority, it was said, was given to the Secretary to obtain the Loan under the blended authority of both acts. This is not one of the charges included in the resolutions before the Committee, and therefore this is not the time to answer it. However, if this were fact, nothing criminal could in consequence be imputed; and, since the purposes of both laws were carried into execution, there could be no ground for saying that either was violated. He said much on the impracticability of the line of conduct which some gentlemen appeared to think ought to have been followed by the Secretary. It was impossible to keep different funds, differently appropriated, so inviolably separate as that one might not be used for the object of the other; all was right, he conceived, provided what was taken was to be replaced. He was also of opinion that the overflowing of one fund could be applied to make up the deficiency of another; and that that is necessary is to give priority to the appropriation. The money paid in Europe for interest on the Loan was said to have been improperly applied, because the fund appropriated for the purpose was represented here by an equal sum: and he contended that, though the interest was not paid in the identical coin appropriated, yet, by allowing a very reasonable latitude of expression, it could be said that the interest was paid with the money appropriated, for the applicability of the sums there depended on the existence of the fund here. He next turned to the second charge in the resolution; and, after showing that the natural presumption was, that the Secretary either was instructed or had a discretionary power, he then vindicated his conduct in respect to the drafts of money to this country. He did honor the motives of the gentlemen who had instituted the inquiry, and concluded an elegant speech, by a contrasted picture of our former and present situation as a country, dwelling upon the importance of preserving harmony, and insisting on the danger of giving rise to suspicions against a highly responsible officer, and of bringing forward charges not to be supported by proof.

Mr. FINLEY.—If my hopes respecting the Government have not been equally elevated with those of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Ames,] neither are my apprehensions so much depressed with fears. But I hope I am equally anxious for the stability and prosperity of the Government; and though we differ in opinion on this question, yet I am firmly persuaded that the part I take is the best calculated to promote the necessary confidence in Government, and secure the virtue of its Administration. As the gentleman, in an elegant discourse, has explained no difficulties, nor adduced any proofs in support of his opinions, I will only add, that I believe the Government to be so well established, and so much beloved by the citizens, as not to be endangered by the House of Representatives' examining how the laws have been obeyed in the application of public money, and giving their opinions upon the result of that examination.

That the Secretary has not reported fully to this House, in due time, is so much within the knowledge of every member, that it is impossible to doubt of the truth of the fact, however we may differ about the propriety of the conduct. To go no further back than last session—besides the references to the Secretary to report upon the Ways and Means, and inform the House what revenue were necessary, on the 30th of February, 1791, a standing order was resolved, directing that he should report to the House, within a few days after the meeting of the next session, "an accurate statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all the public moneys, in which shall be distinguished the expenditures which fall under each head of appropriation, and that it shall be shown the sums, if any, which remain unexpended," &c. Were not the moneys drawn upon loan, public moneys, and were not those loans appropriated? Undoubtedly, they were strictly so. It is a strange evasion to say, that by these expressions, only the current revenue is intended. Arguments must be scarce when this becomes necessary. It requires no refutation.

On the 19th of January last, he was called upon to "lay before the House such information with respect to the finances of the United States, as will enable the Legislature to judge whether any, or what additional revenues will be necessary." In consequence of the recommendations of the President, and the wishes of this House, to commence the discharge of the redeemable part of the funded Debt, a reference was made to the Secretary, requiring him to report a mode for the application of the public money for that purpose; the House being assured, by the gentleman who moved the resolution, that no new tax was intended or necessary. But the Secretary, so far from informing the House how much money he had subject to his discretion, in the Bank, in notes, &c., proposed a new and partial tax, as the foundation of a new system of loans. When the memorable bill to authorize another loan of $2,000,000, was before the House, a few weeks ago, we were told by gentlemen on this floor, that there was not time for argument; that the bill must be passed in three or four days, &c.; and when we wanted information, we were told by some of the friends of the bill that it was not convenient to give information there—that we might procure information elsewhere, as they had done. I confess I did not comprehend this method of legislating; but the Secretary has since explained it, in one of his Reports, by complaining of the House, because the members did not go to his office and ask information, instead of requiring it to be publicly reported.

Even when this favorite bill for a new loan was before the House, the Secretary did not condescend to inform us that he had, without authority, provided near a million and a half of dollars for that purpose; he did not inform us how obligingly he had drawn bills upon our bankers in Holland, to have the money put in our way. Thus, in order to anticipate the payments due to the Bank, he did what he could to induce Congress to break the public faith, by repealing the existing appropriation made for securing the discharge of a debt of justice and gratitude to the French nation. From this and other instances, it appears, that however high the Secretary's regard for public credit may be, there are other considerations which have obtained a higher degree of his attention than obedience to the laws. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Madison] has so clearly explained the nature of that discretion with which the Secretary is vested, and so fully proved that there was no necessity to justify a departure from the appropriations made by law, that it is not necessary for me to explain further on this head. However, I cannot help remarking, that the discretionary powers were pretty freely exercised. The drawing of bills began early indeed, and were continued to a recent period. The times of drawing fortunately corresponded with the necessities of the Bank, and the power of employing agents was pretty freely used. The same agents were frequently both the sellers and the purchasers of the bills. Perhaps this was necessary: no doubt it was convenient. Probably it was safe; but who can say it will be always so.

I have not said so much to prove the truth of the facts expressed in the resolution, for of this there can be no doubt—it is as clear as the sun, shining in day-light,—but, in order to prove the propriety of this Committee expressing its disapprobation of a conduct so unjustifiable. That information was withheld unduly, is evident from the lateness of this discussion; that it was obtained with difficulty, is evident from the numerous applications we were obliged to make in order to obtain it.

Mr. BOURDINOT called the attention of the Committee to the change in the usual situation of the House. They were no longer acting in a Legislative capacity, but were now exercising the important office of the grand inquest of the Nation. It was necessary to advert to this circumstance, to prevent running into the diffuse mode of argument that had improperly been adopted on this occasion. A gentleman of this Committee had thought proper to institute an inquiry into the conduct of an officer of the Government in a very important and highly responsible station. He had exhibited his charges against him in writing—had reduced them to certain and specific facts. To these, and to these alone, he had pointed his evidence, and we were bound in honor and in conscience to give a just and decisive opinion on each independent charge. In the first place, the truth of the facts must be settled and established; if in their favor, the criminality would then necessarily require a second consideration. The honor and reputation of the officer thus charged, as well as the respect due to the gentleman who had brought forward the accusation, required a steady, uniform, and disinterested examination of every question from us. Under this view of the subject, Mr. B. said he should avoid the desultory mode of argument that had been run into on both sides, and confine himself to the nature of the facts charged, and the evidence adduced in support of them. The short time that yet remained of the session was too precious to waste in collateral arguments, or the consideration of merely presumptive proofs. The first charge in the resolution now before the Committee was, "That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law passed on the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the same law, in the following particulars, to wit: 1st. By applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the principal, which interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law. 2d. By drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instruction of the PRESIDENT." These specific charges make it necessary for us to understand determinately the terms of the act mentioned in the resolution, and the nature of the proof offered in its support. By the act of the 4th August, 1790, section 2—

"The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is authorized to cause to be borrowed a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole twelve millions of dollars; and that so much of this sum as may be necessary to the discharge of the arrears of interest on loans heretofore made by the United States in foreign countries, and the instalments of the principal of the said Foreign Debt, and (if it could be effected upon terms advantageous to the United States) to the paying off the whole of the said Foreign Debt, be appropriated solely to these purposes; and the PRESIDENT was moreover further authorized to cause to be made such other contracts respecting the said Debt as should be found for the interest of the said States."

It is asserted by the prosecutor of these charges that this act contained an emphatic appropriation of the whole of the twelve millions of dollars to the payment of the Foreign Debt. By a Letter to Mr. Short of May 9, 1791, read in the Committee, it appears that a Loan of three millions of florins had been made, and that one-half only was appropriated to the payment of our debt to France, and that eight hundred thousand florins were to be drawn to this country. This was said to be contrary to the terms of the appropriation, and without authority; and the Secretary's Report of January 3, 1793, folio 3, was referred to in proof of the fact "that the interest arising on the principal borrowed under this act was paid out of that principal;" when, by the same law, part of the domestic revenues of the United States were appropriated to that purpose. The words of the Report are, "payments on account of other Foreign Loans made and to be made to the 1st January, 1793, inclusive. February 1, 1791, two hundred and eighty-nine thousand seven hundred and eighty-three florins six stivers, with several other payments on the same terms, till January 1, 1793, amounting in the whole to one million eight hundred and thirty-three thousand one hundred and eighty nine florins two stivers eight deniers. These payments were asserted to be on account of interest on the principal borrowed, but without further proof. By the Report, folio 4, it appears that on the 1st of February, 1790, there was borrowed no more than one million one hundred and sixty-seven thousand florins, on which was due the 1st of February, 1791, one year's interest, amounting, at five per cent., to fifty-eight thousand three hundred and fifty florins; but this evidence proves that two hundred and eighty-nine thousand seven hundred and eighty-three florins were paid on that day. Can gentlemen be serious when they assert that this was for interest on this principal borrowed, being almost twenty-five per cent. per annum, instead of five. This certainly is an inattention to the subject that the serious nature of the charge cannot justify. Mr. B. then asserted that, on a critical examination of these items, they will be found to be instalments of the Dutch Loans made by the old Congress, and which this money was expressly appropriated to discharge; but he said he did not mean to avoid the fact, had it been proved, but he denied that any evidence of it arose from this testimony. The PRESIDENT was generally authorized to make the loans. Money arising from a domestic fund was appropriated to pay the interest. It happened that the Loan was made in Europe, to the amount of three millions of florins; part of it was to be drawn to this country, but before that event interest became due; this was paid out of the moneys intended to be drawn into this country, and repaid by the fund here, to prevent the unnecessary sending the moneys from one country to the other. Mr. B. asked, if the Secretary had done otherwise, would any man in his senses have thought him worthy of the trust committed to him? But the gentleman has proceeded on this charge (and has so expressed himself) as if this loan was exclusively made under the act of the 4th August, mentioned in the resolution before us, and therefore was wholly appropriated by law to the payment of the Foreign Debt, and ought not, in any part, to have been drawn into this country for other purposes. This brings to consideration the act of the 12th August, 1790, passed eight days after the act alluded to. By the 4th section of this act the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is authorized to cause to be borrowed a sum or sums not exceeding two millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per cent., and that the interest should be applied to the purchase of the Debt of the United States. The difference between these acts was, by that of the 4th of August, the PRESIDENT had a discretion as to the application of the sum borrowed towards payment of the whole of the Foreign Debt, over and above the instalments, depending upon terms of advantage to the United States. By the second act there was no discretion, the whole moneys being positively directed by law to be applied towards the purchasing of the Domestic Debt. By the first there was no restriction, in point of interest, to be paid, but an injunction that the terms of repayment should be stipulated within fifteen years. By the second, interest was restricted to five per cent., and no terms of repayment enjoined. By the preamble to the first law, the object of it appears to be the doing of justice and supporting public credit, by the payment of the Foreign Debt; by that of the second, "the reduction of the Public Debt, which would be beneficial to the credit of the Union, by raising the price of their stock, and be productive of savings to the United States." By virtue of these acts the PRESIDENT thought proper to constitute the Secretary of the Treasury his agent to make the loans; and, accordingly, on the 28th of August, 1790, by a commission under his hand and seal, reciting both the said laws, authorized him, "by himself or any other person or persons generally, to borrow, within the United States or elsewhere, a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole fourteen millions of dollars, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained." With this commission the Secretary received instructions relative to the said loans, in these words: "You shall borrow, or cause to be borrowed, on the best terms which shall be found practicable, and within the limitations prescribed by law, as to the time of repayment and rate of interest, such sum or sums as shall be sufficient to discharge as well all instalments or parts of the principal of the Foreign Debt which now are due, or shall become payable to the end of the year 1791, as all interest and arrears of interest which now are or shall become due, in respect to the said Debt, to the same end of the year 1791. And you shall apply, or cause to be applied, the moneys which shall be so borrowed, with all convenient despatch, to the payment of the said instalments and parts of the principal and interest, and arrears of the interest of the said Debt. You shall not extend the amount of the said Loan beyond the sum which shall be necessary for completing such payment, unless upon terms more advantageous to the United States," &c.

These instructions related solely to the application of the twelve millions, the two millions, as before observed, being applied by law, without any discretionary power, to the reduction of the Public Debt. Under this commission, it is in proof the Secretary caused three millions of florins to be borrowed in Europe generally, without expressing particularly under which law, but reciting under them both. He directed half of this sum to be applied to the payment of the Foreign Debt, and part of the other half he appropriated, for the purposes mentioned, towards the reduction of the Public Debt. But it is insisted that the whole of this money was borrowed under the act of the 4th August, and therefore it was highly criminal to apply any part of it to the discharge of the interest arising on the principal so borrowed, there being another fund designed for that purpose. But it has clearly appeared that the Secretary made this Loan in Europe, where the interest was to be paid and had become due; the fund for its payment was in this country; and therefore, if he was authorized to draw any part of that principal into the United States, it was a mere economical operation, to pay the interest there out of those moneys on the spot, and repay them out of moneys here, where they were to be applied, and by that means prevent the loss of insurance and interest, that must have arisen by another negotiation. This question, then, depends wholly on the fact whether this money was borrowed by virtue of both acts, or under that of the 12th of August exclusively.

The Loan was made at five per cent., subject to charges and discounts of four and a half per cent. on the whole. The Secretary thought this within the act of the twelfth of August, limiting him to an interest not exceeding five per cent. This was the opinion of others besides the Secretary. Mr. B. himself had been of that opinion, and at the time thought an application to the Legislature unnecessary. But the prudence and caution of the Secretary led him to state this fact to Congress for their consideration and determination, who, by an act of the 3d March, 1791, declared their sense of the act of the 12th of August, and that the Loan was legally made under that act. The preamble to this act removes all doubt on this question:

"Whereas it hath been made known to Congress that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in consequence of an act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, (that is, that of the twelfth of August,) hath caused a certain loan to be made in Holland, on account of the United States, to the amount of three millions of florins, bearing an interest of five per cent., &c. "And whereas it hath been also stated to Congress that the charges upon said loan have amounted to four and a half per cent., whereby a doubt hath arisen, whether the said loan be within the meaning of the said last-mentioned act, which limits the rate of interest to five per cent. per annum. And whereas it is expedient that the said doubt should be removed, be it enacted, &c., that the loan aforesaid shall be deemed and construed to be within the true intent and meaning of the said act making provision for the reduction of the public debt," &c.

This puts an end to any dispute on this subject; and if this money was borrowed under both acts jointly, or exclusively under the act of the twelfth August, there can be no propriety or justice in the charge, that the Secretary had violated the act of the fourth of August in applying part of this money to the purposes of the act of the twelfth of August, under which the Loan, as to a greater sum, was certainly made. By this act also the opinion of the Secretary of the meaning of the act of the twelfth of August as to the restriction of the interest to five per cent. was confirmed, and of course all his proceedings under it. There can then be no foundation for the charge, and it remains unsupported by proof.

The next part of the accusation attempted to be supported, was the drawing part of the same "moneys of the United States without instructions from the President." The instructions from the President as to the making the loans and applying them were only called for; he has therefore only reported these to the House; from this negative testimony, it was presumed that no other instructions have been given. This is weak support, indeed, to a criminal charge of this nature. I know it has been urged by one gentleman [Mr. Mendenhall] that the Secretary has been called upon for the instructions, and if he has failed to report them to the House, he ought to suffer: this shows how fallible gentlemen's memories are. There has been no call whatever of the House on the Secretary for this purpose—our Journals do not show any. The requisition was to the President, and he has complied with the terms of it. But if we are to rest on presumptive evidence, the presumption is in favor of the Secretary. The President has not made objections to the conduct of his agent. He has mentioned the loans to Congress, without disapprobation. The agent was properly accountable to him, and he has not found fault with him; but in his Speech at the opening of this and the last session of Congress, has expressed great satisfaction in the state of public affairs. But if the gentlemen who advocate this prosecution really believed this fact, had they it not in their power to have rendered the evidence certain to demonstration, by requesting, by resolutions of the House, that the President would declare whether this money was or was not drawn in consequence of his instructions, or with his approbation and consent? Can any man suppose that so responsible an agent as the Secretary of the Treasury would presume (for his own sake) to proceed in so important negotiation, without the knowledge, approbation, and directions of the President of the United States? But, for argument sake, suppose the fact to be true, is not the Secretary an officer to superintend the collection of the public revenue? As soon as this Loan was made under the act of the twelfth of August, was it not his duty, without further instructions, to draw the money into the United States for the purposes mentioned in the act? Would he not have been highly culpable if he had left this money in Holland till the next session of Congress, and waited for a law authorizing him so to do? It is really a reflection on the whole Legislature to suppose they would have directed a Loan which should remain inactive on an interest of five per cent. without giving a power of application.

But it has been said that a larger sum, viz., almost three millions of dollars, has been drawn into this country, which was more than the President himself was authorized to do. If this is meant to criminate the President, we ought to know it. How does the fact stand? It is agreed that the President had a right to draw the moneys loaned under the act of the twelfth of August.

He had a right to make such other contracts respecting the Debt as should be for the interest of the United States, in consequence whereof the agent in Europe agreed with the National Assembly or the Executive of France, for the payment of four millions of livres, part of their debt, in the produce of the United States, for the supply of St. Domingo.

2,991,316 90

This, then, makes about the sum that it is proved was drawn for by the Secretary, and shows that he did not exceed the powers vested in the President for this purpose.

It has been also held up as highly criminal in the Secretary, that although he began to draw for this money in December, 1790, yet he never gave information to Congress or to the Trustees for purchasing the Public Debt on the subject; but left them wholly in the dark with respect to so important a measure, when it was his duty particularly to have kept the House constantly informed, and that this could only have happened for the purpose of covering some improper design, or aiding individuals with the public moneys of the United States.

To this charge Mr. B. said, he had paid serious attention, for as on the one hand he would ever be ready to bring every defaulter in public office, however exalted in character, to condign punishment, where found guilty: on the other hand, he wished ever to be found giving full support to every good officer of Government against unfounded charges of peculation and mismanagement of the public revenue. He had satisfied his mind on the subject, not being able to find a scintilla of evidence to support the charge, but abundant testimony to the contrary.

1. Congress knew that this money was appropriated to the payment of the debts in this country, that the Loan was made in Holland, and therefore that it must necessarily be drawn here for the purposes of the act.

2. By the Report of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, folio 12, under the date of the 25th of August, 1790, is the following entry:

"It is probable that it will be deemed advisable to pay the interest for the year 1791 on the amount of the foreign debt out of foreign loans. There is one now maturing for the acceptance of the United States, amounting to three millions of florins, the proceeds of which may be at command in the course of the present year."

The expediency of an acceptance of the loan, and of an application of one third of it, to the purpose of the act, for the reduction of the Public Debt, is under the consideration of the President or the United States."—Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury.

This entry affords strong presumption against all the suggestions of the want of instructions from the President, or his ignorance of the proceedings of the Secretary.

3. The Speech of the President delivered to both Houses of Congress, on the 8th of December, 1790, has the following paragraph:

"In conforming to the powers vested in me by the acts of the last session, a Loan of three millions of florins, towards which some provisional measures had previously taken place, has been completed in Holland. The Secretary of the Treasury has my directions to communicate such further particulars as may be requisite for more precise information."

4. The Report of the Secretary in conformity to that direction, dated 24th February, 1791, mentioning terms of the loans and application of moneys.

5. The preamble of the act of 3d March, 1791, already read.

6. In the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the receipts and expenditures from the commencement of the Government to the 31st of December, 1791, is the following article of receipts:

FOREIGN LOANS.

"From the President, Directors, & Co., of the Bank of North America, being the produce of bills of exchange, drawn on the agents for negotiating Foreign loans in Holland - $229,369 47

"From the President, Directors, & Co., of the Bank of New York, being the produce of bills of exchange, drawn on the agents aforesaid - 132,121 87

$361,391 34

7. In the Treasurer's account, commencing January 1, 1792, and ending on the 31st March, 1792, are found the following entries of receipts:

"On the proceeds of bills of exchange, drawn on Willhelm & Jan Willink, Nicholas and Jacob Van Steenhorst & Hubbard, of Amsterdam, on account of loans made for the United States, per statement, $402,903 89."

In his account commencing on the 1st of April, 1792, and ending on the 30th of June, 1792:

"On the proceeds of bills of exchange, &c., in same words, $1,400,000."

In his account commencing on the 1st of July, 1792, and ending on the 30th of September, 1792:

"On the proceeds of bills of exchange, &c., in same words, $1,000,000."

Mr. B., after reading these vouchers, proceeded: These, Mr. Chairman, are the facts that have convinced my mind, at first much alarmed at the severity of the charges and the positive assertions of gentlemen, that discoveries would be made, showing corruption at the very heart of the Goverment; these have convinced me fully that this prosecution has been rashly brought forward, without a proper examination of the transaction. My mind, in a conscientious research into the facts, has not been able to raise a doubt, on which to found even a suspicion of the integrity or abilities of the Secretary in this whole negotiation. So far am I from considering those charges supported by testimony, that I consider the conduct of the officer concerned in this transaction, not only wholly cleared up, but the measures he has pursued as stamped with wisdom and official knowledge. So far am I from judging him reprehensible for the manner in which he has negotiated and applied these loans, that I think him deserving of the thankful approbation of his country for his economy and strict attention to the true interests and credit of the United States. I rejoice, sir, that after so full and zealous an investigation, this officer, though unheard, appears to be free from even a suspicion of misconduct in the whole transaction; this is not only honorable to him, but does credit to our country. On the whole, therefore, I am decidedly against the present resolutions, and shall give them my hearty negative.

The House then adjourned until seven o'clock post meridian.

EVENING SESSION—7 P. M.

An engrossed bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act providing for the compensation of Ebenezer Storer," was read twice, and committed.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions contained in the motion of Thursday last, respecting the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. The third resolution being still under consideration, in the words following, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law passed the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the said law, in the following particulars, viz: First, by applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed, to the payment of interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law. Secondly, by drawing a part of the said moneys into the United States, without the instructions of the President of the United States.

A motion was made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee to the resolution, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 40, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Artemas Ward, Hugh Williams, and Francis Willis.

A motion was then made, and the question put, that the House do agree with the Committee to the Whole House in their disagreement to the fourth resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has deviated from the instructions given him by the President of the United States, in executing the authorities for making loans, under the acts of the fourth and twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Artemas Ward, and Hugh Williams.

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the fifth resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has omitted to discharge an essential duty of his office, in failing to give Congress official information, in due time, of the moneys drawn by him from Europe into the United States; which drawing commenced December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and continued until January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and of the cause of making such drafts.

Mr. DAYTON said, that, at so late an hour of the night, he was unwilling to detain the Committee unnecessarily. He trusted, however, that they would grant him their indulgence and attention for a few moments before the vote was taken. The resolution upon which the sense of the Committee was about to be expressed contained a direct charge against the Secretary of the Treasury for having "failed to give Congress official information in due time of the moneys drawn by him from Europe into the United States, and of the cause of such drafts." He rose principally to remark, that the arguments which had been used by the advocates of these resolutions, in support of the first which had been discussed, and particularly by the member from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON.] were of such a nature as must, if applied to the one now under debate, compel that gentleman to abandon this charge, and give it his negative, if he would preserve any sort of consistency between his arguments and his vote.

It had been asserted by him, and seemed to be relied upon as an important fact, that the Secretary's agency in respect to foreign loans did not necessarily result from the duties of his office, or the constitution of the Treasury Department, which on that head was silent, but that it was founded upon a special commission and instructions given to that officer by the President, in whom the laws had vested an authority. Under that view, then, it was deemed convenient and proper to regard the President as the principal, and the Secretary as his agent, in order that there might appear to be some foundation for the charge against the latter for having acted in any instance without the express instructions of the former. If this was truly the relationship in which the Secretary stood to the President—if the President's commission was his authority, and the President's instructions his law and guide—if the case of loans was, in respect to the Treasury Department, an extraordinary and extra-official one, not necessarily falling under the head of it, but distinct from the ordinary revenues which bounded his legal authority, as had been declared by a member from Virginia and another from Pennsylvania, Mr. D. called upon those two gentlemen to explain with what propriety the Secretary of the Treasury could be censured for not comprising in his annual official statement of receipts and expenditures of public moneys in his Department a report of his agency in a business unconnected therewith, which he transacted, not in quality of financier, but of agent, and for which he was directly responsible to the President, who was his principal, and who could, and doubtless would, have dismissed him from office, if he had acted unfaithfully. There appeared to his mind (Mr. D. said) such inconsistency and contradiction between the reasoning he had quoted and the resolution on the table, as induced him to believe that all who gave their assent to those arguments, but especially those who had expressed and supported them, would join with him in voting against this proposition.

But there were other reasons (Mr. D. added) which seemed to his judgment to lead irresistibly to the same conclusion. The House of Representatives had already expressed their sense upon this subject. Their resolutions, passed on the 23d of January, without any opposition, evidently recognised certain principles which directly militated against those contained in this resolution. The President of the United States was there requested to communicate the information wanted. It is well known to every member that this mode was never adopted in any call for information respecting our fiscal concerns, or other matters relating to the ordinary business of the Department, but that it was always observed when the information wanted was of such a nature as to render it improper for either of the subordinate Executive officers to give it without the order of their head, the President. Shall the Secretary of the Treasury, then, be censured for not reporting to Congress transactions unasked for, which it is admitted he was not at liberty to report, even upon the order of the House, without the sanction and express direction of the President? Shall he be censured for not giving information of the moneys drawn by him from Europe, and of the causes of making such drafts, when the very laws which authorized the loan of fourteen millions, point out the causes, declare the purposes, and designate the appropriation? The act of the 12th of August directed the application of two millions to the purchase of the Public Debt. Was not this contrary the only proper place for that operation? And would any one say that those purchases could be made advantageously for the United States unless the money was drawn here? Was there not a discretionary power given to the Executive over the other twelve millions destined to the payment of our debt to France, in virtue of which, such portion of it might be drawn here as might be deemed consistent with the public good? Had not events fully justified Congress in having granted in the use they had made of it? Through the instrumentality of those drafts, we had been enabled to purchase nearly two millions of our own debt, and to pay in this country (principally in our own produce) about half a million of the French debt, by which the Colony of St. Domingo had been relieved from its sufferings, and the Government and people of France highly gratified and benefited. Far from meriting censure for arrangements so provident and beneficial, the man who had effected them was (Mr. D. asserted) entitled to the commendation and thanks of his countrymen. That the Secretary had discharged both his ordinary and extraordinary duties with ability and integrity, had been directly denied by none; that he had misconstrued the act of the 4th of August, and departed from its true spirit, had been urged and supported by very few; but that the arrangements which he made had proved beneficial to France, and highly favorable to the interests of the United States, seemed to have been admitted by all, even by the very gentlemen who had questioned the legality of them.

Mr. D. concluded with saying that he was happy to find he should be with a very large majority of the House in the vote that the Secretary was not chargeable with the omission and failure which the resolution aimed to fix upon him.

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, El-

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the sixth resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has, without the instruction of the PRESIDENT or THE UNITED STATES, drawn more moneys, borrowed in Holland, into the United States, than the PRESIDENT or THE UNITED STATES was authorized to draw, under the act of the twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, which act appropriated two millions of dollars only, when borrowed, to the purchase of the Public Debt; and that he has omitted to discharge an essential duty of his office, in failing to give official information to the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, of the various sums drawn from time to time, suggested by him to have been intended for the purchase of the Public Debt."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Giles, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, and Josiah Parker.

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the seventh resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury did not consult the public interest, in negotiating a Loan with the Bank of the United States, and drawing therefrom four hundred thousand dollars at five per centum per annum, when a greater sum of public money was deposited in various banks, at the respective periods of making the respective drafts."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 8, as follows:

MARCH, 1793.]

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

[H. OF R.]

Indian war. Mr. S. could not forbear expressing great surprise at this remark of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MANISON,] when he recollected what had been just before said by the same gentleman in support of the former resolution. The gentleman, on that occasion, in his attempt to disprove the right of the Secretary, ex officio, to superintend the moneys derived from the Foreign loans, had endeavored to establish a nice distinction between the ordinary internal revenues of the country, and the resources resulting from Foreign loans. The law constituting the Treasury Department, he had said, gave the Secretary power only over the revenues, which embraced only the ordinary resources, whereas loans were distinct things, the management of which was specially intrusted by law to the Supreme Magistrate, and in relation to which the Secretary could exercise no authority whatever that was not derived from the PRESIDENT. The gentleman now argued that the Secretary was blameable in not giving information of the state of these extraordinary resources, which were not within his Department, when only called upon to state the amount of the ordinary revenues, which were within his Department. He left it to the gentleman to reconcile this contradiction, for certainly his doctrine was erroneous on the former occasion, or it must be so now. If the moneys obtained from Foreign loans were to be deemed the revenues of the country, then they fell of course under the management of the Head of the Treasury Department, and it was wrong in the gentleman to impute misconduct to the Secretary for exercising a legal authority; if, on the contrary, those moneys were viewed as an extra resource, and not within the purview of the Secretary's functions, then it was wrong to censure him for not communicating a state of those moneys, when required only to report the ordinary revenues.

Without admitting the soundness of the distinction set up by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. S. said that it was never in the intention of the House, nor in the idea of any individual member, to call for a state of the moneys proceeding from the Foreign loans, when they passed the order of the 19th January, 1792. That order was in these terms:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information with respect to the finances of the United States, as will enable the Legislature to judge whether any additional revenue will be necessary in consequence of the proposed increase of the military establishment."

This call was fully complied with, for the Secretary laid before the House an estimate of the internal revenues—which, unquestionably, were the only revenues in contemplation of the House at the time—and the House being satisfied that they were incompetent, laid additional duties. The House knew, as well as the Secretary, that loans had been made, and that moneys had, under them, been drawn into this country; but they knew that those moneys had been specially appropriated to the Sinking Fund, and it never entered into the idea of any member to divert them from that beneficial object, in order to apply them to the current service. It was not to be supposed that the Secretary would have recommended such a diversion. To impute blame to him for not communicating the amount of moneys drawn from time to time, there must have been some law or order of the House requiring the communication, or it must have been necessary to some object depending before the House. What law or order of the House made it necessary? None. The laws authorized the loans, and prescribed their objects; the rest was mere Executive business; and no communication was necessary to any measure depending before the House.

But though the Secretary would not have been censurable for omitting to give the information, the truth was, that the PRESIDENT'S Speech of 8th December, 1790, the Secretary's Report of 25th February, and the act of the 3d of March, 1791, were conclusive proofs that the Legislature knew that the proceeds of the loans were in a train of being brought to the United States, and the accounts of receipts and expenditures presented in the first week of the session, informed the House that a large sum had been drawn for, and the Treasurer's quarterly account contained further information on the subject, all which was prior to any call of the House for such information. Hence, Mr. S. deduced, that it was not a fact that the Secretary had failed to give the information, as stated in the resolution, and that had he even so failed, he would not have been censurable for a breach of an essential duty of his office. It had been said, by a member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FINDLEY,] that the lateness of the information from the Secretary made it inconvenient to go into an inquiry of his official conduct so near the close of the session. To this, Mr. S. replied, that he did not expect such a remark from that quarter of the House. If the gentleman had not been prepared for the inquiry, or thought it an improper season to enter upon it, why did he second the motion for bringing forward the charges? If suspicion had so long existed against the integrity of the Secretary, why was not information called for at the beginning of the session? Why was the call delayed till the session was within a few weeks of its termination? It was admitted that the Secretary had obeyed the order of the House with wonderful alacrity and promptitude. It was indeed strange that the gentleman who brought forward the charges, should be the first to complain that there was not time for their consideration.

Mr. S. concluded by noticing the observation of Mr. MANISON and Mr. MANSON, that the opinion of the House on the preceding resolutions would not change the truth of facts, and that the public would ultimately decide whether the Secretary's conduct was criminal or not. This, said Mr. S., was like the conduct of a prosecutor, who having chosen his jurisdiction, and being nonsuited, wished to appeal to another tribunal. Why were the resolutions brought before the House? Was it not to substantiate the truth of them by a vote? And had the prosecution succeeded, would the Secretary have had an appeal to the public? No; the resolutions would have been sent to the President, and the Secretary would have been removed, disgraced, and ruined forever, without appeal.

Mr. FINDLEY said: Since these resolutions were laid on the table, I have, upon reflection, been convinced of the impropriety of connecting it with the others, or of treating this part of the Secretary's conduct in this manner. It is solely in the power of this House to punish all contemptuous or indecent treatment of its authority or orders; for this purpose, it is not necessary to lay our opinions in this way before the public, report them to the President, or make them a foundation of impeachment. We might have ordered him to the bar of this House, and obliged him to make proper acknowledgments, and I have known some high in office treated in this manner for infinitely less impropriety. It is true, in the case to which I allude, I thought the affair was carried too far; the offence was only a letter to the House respecting the conduct of a member, whom the officer charged with making free with his character in an insidious manner among the members. I would be sorry to see this House pursue such trifles. Though the indecorum of the Secretary to this House is of a higher nature, I think it is best to treat it with silent contempt; I will vote against this resolution, lest it should be interpreted as a relinquishment of our authority to punish contempts.

The question was then taken, and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 7, as follows:

SATURDAY, March 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of Lewis Garanger, on behalf of his brother, Charles Garanger; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating certain inaccuracies in printing the statements communicated by his first and second Letters lately presented, on the subject of Foreign loans, and expressing a wish that some regulation may be adopted to enable the Head of the Treasury Department to secure the fidelity and correctness of the printed copies of the reports which shall hereafter be made to the House, and shall be committed to the press by their order, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the committee have examined into the circumstances stated in the Letter, and find that the standing order of the Clerk of this House to the printer, is, to send the proof sheets of all reports and statements to the Department from whence they were made, and that this practice has been generally followed.

"That it has been discontinued during the present session (so far as respects the Secretary of the Treasury) from an opinion of the printer, that the delay which the examination would occasion, might interfere with the intention of the House, of having the business speedily accomplished.

"It did not appear to the committee, that any unnecessary delay had taken place at the office of the Comptroller, by reason of the examination of the proof sheets, nor in the printer, in the execution of his business.

"The committee are of opinion, that it is not necessary for them to recommend any new regulation for the future execution of this business; but, in order to rectify the errors which have taken place in the printed reports and statements, the committee recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That there be printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, three hundred copies of the reports and statements made by him during the present session, and that the same be delivered to the Clerk to this House."

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be deemed to continue in office until a successor be appointed.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper and assistant Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall be deemed to continue in office until successors to those officers, respectively, be appointed.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to pay to Thomas Claxton, out of the money appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of this House, the sum of eighty dollars, for extra services.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making addition to the compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of the Revenue; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And on the question, that the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Thomas Hartley, Philip Key, John Laurence, Richard Bland Lee, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Van Murray, Josiah Parker, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, John Steele, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—Abraham Clark, William B. Giles, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, William Barry Grove, James Hillhouse, Aaron Kitchell, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Macon, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Peter Sylvester, Jeremiah Smith, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, and Artemas Ward.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Simeon Thayer," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and the same being read, was disagreed to—yeas 17, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Nicholas Gilman, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, John Laurence, Richard Bland Lee, Samuel Livermore, Josiah Parker, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, George Thatcher, Thomas Tredwell, and Francis Willis.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the President of the UNITED STATES will, on Monday next, take the oath of office required by the Constitution, in the Senate Chamber, at twelve o'clock.

An engrossed bill making addition to the compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of the Revenue, was read the third time and passed.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to Congress, on the first Monday of January next, the number of stills in the respective districts, distinguishing those that are employed in distilling spirits from materials of the growth of the United States; and also, the nett product of revenue arising from the respective Districts and States, particularizing the drawbacks, and distinguishing the Foreign from American materials, and the product by the gallon, month, and year. Also, the number of officers, and amount of their salaries.

The House then adjourned until seven o'clock post meridian.

EVENING SESSION—7 P. M.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue to him; also, a report of the general state of the revenue on stills, and on spirits distilled, within the United States, made in pursuance of the order of this House, of the eighth of May last; which were read, and laid on the table.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House be directed, to suffer such persons as have given in statements of their public conduct, to the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under General St. Clair, to take copies of all or any such statements.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill marking farther provision for securing and collecting the duties on Foreign and Domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and were discharged from the further consideration of the said bill.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his reports on sundry petitions; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate having completed the Legislative business before them, are now about to adjourn.

Resolved, That Mr. Boudinot, Mr. Sedgwick, and Mr. Hindman, be appointed a committee, jointly, with a committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn without day, unless he may have any farther communications to make to them.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress, and have appointed a committee for that purpose, on their part.

On a motion made and seconded, "That the thanks of the House of Representatives be presented to JONATHAN TRUMBULL, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the Chair, and in the execution of the difficult and important trust reposed in him, as SPEAKER of the said House,"

It was resolved unanimously: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER made his acknowledgments to the House, in manner following:

"GENTLEMEN: You have made me very happy by this testimony of your approbation of my conduct in the Chair. I feel, at the same time, an additional pleasure in the opportunity of rendering to you my sincere acknowledgments for the kind candor and indulgence, as well as the constant aid and support, which I have experienced in the performance of the duty which you were pleased to assign me. Be assured, gentlemen, I shall ever retain a grateful sense of your goodness—and you will suffer me to add, that my best wishes for your welfare and happiness, in public and private life, will attend each member of this honorable body."

Mr. Boudinot, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress, reported that the Committee had performed that duty, and that the President was pleased to say he had no farther communication to make during the present session: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House sine die.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE SECOND CONGRESS,

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, NOV. 4, 1791.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a Report to the House of Representatives, accompanying certain estimates of sums necessary to be appropriated for various objects therein specified, including the service of the year 1792.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JONATHAN TRUMBULL, Esq.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the House of Representatives the Estimates herewith transmitted, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4: The first relating to the Civil List, or the expenditure for the support of Government during the year 1792, (including incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices,) amounting to $328,653 56

The second relating to certain liquidated claims upon the Treasury; to certain deficiencies in former estimates for the current service, and to a provision in aid of the fund heretofore appropriated for the payment of certain officers of the Courts, jurors, witnesses, &c.

The third relating to the Department of War, showing the stated expenditure of that Department for the year 1792

The amount of a year's pensions to invalids

Pay and subsistence to sundry officers, for which no appropriation has yet been made

Arrearages due upon Indian Affairs for the year 1791, and the sum supposed to be necessary for the year 1792

Expenses incurred for the defensive protection of the frontiers for the years 1790 and 1791, and for which no appropriation has yet been made

Total

$1,058,222 81½

2d Con.—32

As appears by No. 4, which contains a summary of the three preceding ones—exhibiting in one view the total sum as above stated, for which an appropriation is requisite.

The funds out of which the said appropriation may be made are, first, the sum of six hundred thousand dollars reserved annually out of the duties on Imports and Tonnage, by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States, for the support of the Government thereof; and, secondly, such surplus as shall have accrued to the end of the present year upon the revenues heretofore established, over and above the sums necessary for the payment of interest on the Public Debt during the same year, and for the satisfying of other prior appropriations.

Judging from the returns heretofore received at the Treasury, there is good ground to conclude that that surplus, together with the above mentioned sum of six hundred thousand dollars, will be adequate to the object.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

REPORT ON MANUFACTURES.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 15th day of January, 1790, has applied his attention, at as early a period as his other duties would permit, to the subject of Manufactures; and particularly to the means of promoting such as will tend to render the United States independent of Foreign Nations, for military and other essential supplies. And he thereupon respectfully submits the following Report:

The expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States, which was not long since deemed very questionable, appears at this time to be pretty generally admitted. The embarrassments which have obstructed the progress of our external trade, have led to serious reflections on the necessity of enlarging the sphere of our domestic commerce: the restrictive regulations, which in foreign markets abridge the vent of the increasing surplus of our agricultural produce, serve to beget an earnest desire that a more extensive demand for that surplus may be created at home. And the complete success which has rewarded manufac- turing enterprise, in some valuable branches, con- sidering with the promising symptoms which at- tend some less mature essays in others, justify a hope that the obstacles to the growth of this spe- cies of industry are less formidable than they were apprehended to be; and that it is not difficult to find, in its further extension, a full indemnification for any external disadvantages which are or may be experienced, as well as an accession of resources favorable to national independence and safety.

There still are, nevertheless, respectable patrons of opinions, unfriendly to the encouragement of manufactures. The following are, substantially, the arguments by which these opinions are de- fended:

"In every country, (say those who entertain them,) agriculture is the most beneficial and pro- ductive object of human industry. This position, generally, if not universally true, applies with pe- culiar emphasis to the United States, on account of their immense tracts of fertile territory, unin- habited and unimproved. Nothing can afford so advantageous an employment for capital and labor, as the conversion of this extensive wilderness into cultivated farms. Nothing, equally with this, can contribute to the population, strength, and real riches of the country."

"To endeavor, by the extraordinary patronage of Government, to accelerate the growth of ma- nufactures, is, in fact, to endeavor, by force and art, to transfer the natural current of industry from a more to a less beneficial channel. Whatever has such a tendency, must necessarily be unwise: indeed it can hardly ever be wise in a Govern- ment to attempt to give a direction to the indus- try of its citizens. This, under the quick-sighted guidance of private interest, will, if left to itself, infallibly find its own way to the most profitable employment; and it is by such employment that the public prosperity will be most effectually pro- moted. To leave industry to itself, therefore, is, in almost every case, the soundest as well as the simplest policy."

"This policy is not only recommended to the United States by considerations which affect all nations; it is, in a manner, dictated to them by the imperious force of a very peculiar situation. The smallness of their population, compared with their territory; the constant allurements to emi- gration from the settled to the unsettled parts of the country; the facility with which the less in- dependent condition of an artisan can be exchanged for the more independent condition of a farmer; these, and similar causes, conspire to produce, and for a length of time must continue to occasion, a scarcity of hands for manufacturing occupation, and dearth of labor generally. To these disad- vantages for the prosecution of manufactures, a deficiency of pecuniary capital being added, the prospect of a successful competition with the ma- nufactures of Europe must be regarded as little less than desperate. Extensive manufactures can only be the offspring of a redundant, at least of a full population. Until the latter shall characterize the situation of this country, it is vain to hope for the former."

"If, contrary to the natural course of things, an unseasonable and premature spring can be given to certain fabrics by heavy duties, prohibitions, bounties, or by other forced expedients, this will only be to sacrifice the interests of the community to those of particular classes. Besides the misdi- rection of labor, a virtual monopoly will be given to the persons employed on such fabrics; and an enhancement of price, the inevitable consequence of every monopoly, must be defrayed at the ex- pense of the other parts of the society. It is far preferable that those persons should be engaged in the cultivation of the earth, and that we should procure, in exchange for its productions, the com- modities with which foreigners are able to supply us in greater perfection, and upon better terms."

This mode of reasoning is founded upon facts and principles which have certainly respectable pretensions. If it had governed the conduct of nations more generally than it has done, there is room to suppose that it might have carried them faster to prosperity and greatness, than they have attained by the pursuit of maxims too widely op- posite. Most general theories, however, admit of numerous exceptions; and there are few, if any, of the political kind, which do not blend a consi- derable portion of error with the truths they in- culcate.

In order to an accurate judgment how far that which has been just stated ought to be deemed liable to similar imputation, it is necessary to ad- vert carefully to the considerations which plead in favor of manufactures, and which appear to recommend the special and positive encourage- ment of them in certain cases, and under certain reasonable limitations.

It ought readily to be conceded that the culti- vation of the earth, as the primary and most cer- tain source of national supply; as the immediate and chief source of subsistence to man; as the prin- cipal source of those materials which constitute the nutriment of other kinds of labor; as including a state most favorable to the freedom and inde- pendence of the human mind; one, perhaps, most conducive to the multiplication of the human spe- cies; has intrinsically a strong claim to pre-emi- nence over every other kind of industry.

But, that it has a title to anything like an ex- clusive predilection, in any country, ought to be admitted with great caution. That it is even more productive than every branch of industry, requires more evidence than has yet been given in support of the position. That its real interests, precious and important as without the help of exaggeration they truly are, will be advanced ra- ther than injured by the due encouragement of manufactures, may, it is believed, be satisfactorily demonstrated. And it is also believed, that the expediency of such encouragement, in a general view, may be shown to be recommended by the most cogent and persuasive motives of national policy.

It has been maintained that agriculture is not only the most productive, but the only productive species of industry. The reality of this suggestion, in either respect, has, however, not been verified by any accurate detail of facts and calculations; and the general arguments, which are adduced to prove it, are rather subtle and paradoxical than solid or convincing. Those which maintain its exclusive productiveness are to this effect:

Labor, bestowed upon the cultivation of land, produces enough not only to replace all the neces- sary expenses incurred in the business, and to maintain the persons who are employed in it, but to afford, together with the ordinary profit on the stock or capital of the farmer, a nett surplus or rent for the landlord or proprietor of the soil. But the labor of artificers does nothing more than replace the stock which employs them, or which furnishes materials, tools, and wages, and yield the ordinary profit upon that stock. It yields no- thing equivalent to the rent of land. Neither does it add anything to the total value of the whole annual produce of the land and labor of the coun- try. The additional value given to those parts of the produce of land which are wrought into ma- nufactures, is counterbalanced by the value of those other parts of that produce, which are consumed by the manufacturers. It can therefore only be by saving or parsimony, not by the positive pro- ductiveness of their labor, that the classes of arti- ficers can in any degree augment the revenue of the society. To this it has been answered—

1. "That, inasmuch as it is acknowledged that manufacturing labor reproduces a value equal to that which is expended or consumed in carrying it on, and continues in existence the original stock or capital employed, it ought, on that account alone, to escape being considered as wholly un- productive; that though it should be admitted, as alleged, that the consumption of the produce of the soil by the classes of artificers or manufactu- rers is exactly equal to the value added by their labor to the materials upon which it is exerted, yet it would not thence follow that it added no- thing to the revenue of the society, or to the ag- gregate value of the annual produce of its land and labor. If the consumption for any given pe- riod amounted to a given sum, and the increased value of the produce manufactured in the same period to a like sum, the total amount of the con- sumption and production during that period would be equal to the two sums, and consequently double the value of the agricultural produce consumed. And though the increment of value produced by the classes of artificers should at no time exceed the value of the produce of the land consumed by them, yet there would be at every moment, in consequence of their labor, a greater value of goods in the market than would exist independent of it."

2. "That the position, that artificers can aug- ment the revenue of a society only by parsimony, is true in no other sense than in one which is equally applicable to husbandmen or cultivators. It may be alike affirmed, of all these classes, that the fund acquired by their labor and destined for their support, is not, in an ordinary way, more than equal to it. And hence it will follow, that augmentations of the wealth or capital of the com- munity (except in the instances of some extraor- dinary dexterity or skill) can only proceed, with respect to any of them, from the savings of the more thrifty and parsimonious."

3. "That the annual produce of the land and labor of a country can only be increased in two ways, by some improvement in the productive powers of the useful labor which actually exists within it, or by some increase in the quantity of such labor. That with regard to the first, the labor of artificers being capable of greater subdivision and simplicity of operation than that of cultivators, it is susceptible, in a proportionally greater degree, of improvement in its productive powers, whether to be derived from an accession of skill, or from the application of ingenious machinery; in which particular, therefore, the labor employed in the culture of land can pretend to no advantage over that engaged in manufactures. That with regard to an augmentation of the quantity of useful labor, this (excluding adventitious circumstances) must depend essentially upon an increase of capital; which, again, must depend upon the savings made out of the revenues of those who furnish or manage that which is at any time employed, whether in agriculture or in manufactures, or in any other way."

But, while the exclusive productiveness of agricultural labor has been thus denied and refuted, the superiority of its productiveness has been conceded without hesitation. As this concession involves a point of considerable magnitude in relation to maxims of public administration, the grounds on which it rests are worthy of a distinct and particular examination.

One of the arguments made use of in support of the idea, may be pronounced both quaint and superficial; it amounts to this: That in the productions of the soil Nature co-operates with man, and that the effect of their joint labor must be greater than that of the labor of man alone. This, however, is far from being a necessary inference. It is very conceivable, that the labor of man alone, laid out upon a work requiring great skill and art to bring it to perfection, may be more productive, in value, than the labor of Nature and man combined, when directed towards more simple operations and objects: and when it is recollected to what an extent the agency of Nature, in the application of the mechanical powers, is made auxiliary to the prosecution of manufactures, the suggestion which has been noticed loses even the appearance of plausibility.

It might also be observed, with a contrary view, that the labor employed in agriculture is in a great measure periodical and occasional, depending on seasons liable to various and long interruptions; while that occupied in many manufactures is constant and regular, extending through the year, embracing, in some instances, night as well as day. It is also probable that there are among the cultivators of land, more examples of remissness than among artificers. The farmer, from the peculiar fertility of his land, or some other favorable circumstance, may frequently obtain a livelihood, even with a considerable degree of carelessness in the mode of cultivation; but the artisan can with difficulty effect the same object, without exerting himself pretty equally with all those who are engaged in the same pursuit. And if it may likewise be assumed as a fact that manufactures open a wider field to exertions of ingenuity than agriculture, it would not be a strained conjecture, that the labor employed in the former being at once more constant, more uniform, and more ingenious, than that which is employed in the latter, will be found at the same time more productive. But it is not meant to lay stress on observations of this nature: they ought only to serve as a counterbalance to those of a similar complexion. Circumstances so vague and general, as well as so abstract, can afford little instruction in a matter of this kind.

Another, and that which seems to be the principal argument offered for the superior productiveness of agricultural labor, turns upon the allegation that labor employed on manufactures yields nothing equivalent to the rent of land; or to that nett surplus, as it is called, which accrues to the proprietor of the soil. But this distinction, important as it has been deemed, appears rather verbal than substantial. It is easily discernible that what, in the first instance, is divided into two parts, under the denominations of the ordinary profit of the stock of the farmer and rent to the landlord, is, in the second instance, united, under the general appellation of the ordinary profit on the stock of the undertaker; and that this formal or verbal distribution constitutes the whole difference in the two cases. It seems to have been overlooked that the land is, itself, a stock or capital, advanced or lent by its owner to the occupier or tenant, and that the rent he receives is only the ordinary profit of a certain stock in land, not managed by the proprietor himself, but by another to whom he lends or lets it, and who, on his part, advances a second capital to stock and improve the land, upon which he also receives the usual profit. The rent of the landlord and the profit of the farmer, are, therefore, nothing more than the ordinary profits of two capitals, belonging to two different persons, and united in the cultivation of a farm. As in the other case; the surplus which arises upon any manufactory, after replacing the expenses of carrying it on, answers to the ordinary profits of one or more capitals engaged in the prosecution of such manufactory: it is said one or more capitals, because, in fact, the same thing which is contemplated in the case of the farm, sometimes happens in that of a manufactory. There is one who furnishes a part of the capital, or lends a part of the money by which it is carried on, and another who carries it on, with the addition of his own capital. Out of the surplus which remains after defraying expenses, an interest is paid to the money-lender for the portion of the capital furnished by him, which exactly agrees with the rent paid to the landlord; and the residue of that surplus constitutes the profit of the undertaker or manufacturer, and agrees with what is denominated the ordinary profits on the stock of the farmer. Both together make the ordinary profits of two capitals employed in a manufactory; as, in the other case, the rent of the landlord and the revenue of the farmer compose the ordinary profits of two capitals employed in the cultivation of a farm. The rent, therefore, accruing to the proprietor of the land, far from being a criterion of exclusive productiveness, as has been argued, is no criterion even of superior productiveness. The question must still be, whether the surplus, after defraying expenses of a given capital employed in the purchase and improvement of a piece of land, is greater or less than that of a like capital employed in the prosecution of a manufactory? or whether the whole value produced from a given capital and a given quantity of labor, employed in one way, be greater or less than the whole value produced from an equal capital and an equal quantity of labor employed in the other way? or, rather, perhaps, whether the business of agriculture or that of manufactures will yield the greatest product, according to a compound ratio of the quantity of the capital and the quantity of labor, which are employed in the one or in the other?

The solution of either of these questions is not easy; it involves numerous and complicated details, depending on an accurate knowledge of the objects to be compared. It is not known that the comparison has ever yet been made upon sufficient data properly ascertained and analyzed. To be able to make it on the present occasion, with satisfactory precision, would demand more previous inquiry and investigation than there has been hitherto either leisure or opportunity to accomplish. Some essays, however, have been made, towards acquiring the requisite information, which have rather served to throw doubt upon than to confirm the hypothesis under examination. But it ought to be acknowledged that they have been too little diversified, and are too imperfect, to authorize a definitive conclusion either way; leading rather to probable conjecture than to certain deduction. They render it probable, that there are various branches of manufactures in which a given capital will yield a greater total product, and a considerably greater nett product, than an equal capital invested in the purchase and improvement of lands; and that there are also some branches in which both the gross and the nett produce will exceed that of agricultural industry, according to a compound ratio of capital and labor. But it is on this last point that there appears to be the greatest room for doubt. It is far less difficult to infer, generally, that the nett produce of capital engaged in manufacturing enterprises is greater than that of capital engaged in agriculture.

The foregoing suggestions are not designed to inculcate an opinion that manufacturing industry is more productive than that of agriculture. They are intended rather to show that the reverse of this proposition is not ascertained; that the general arguments which are brought to establish it are not satisfactory; and, consequently, that a supposition of the superior productiveness of tillage ought to be no obstacle to listening to any substantial inducements to the encouragement of manufactures, which may be otherwise perceived to exist, through an apprehension that they may have a tendency to divert labor from a more to a less profitable employment. It is extremely probable, that, on a full and accurate development of the matter, on the ground of fact and calculation, it would be discovered that there is no material difference between the aggregate productiveness of the one and of the other kind of industry; and that the propriety of the encouragements which may in any case be proposed to be given to either, ought to be determined upon considerations irrelative to any comparison of that nature.

But, without contending for the superior productiveness of manufacturing industry, it may conduce to a better judgment of the policy which ought to be pursued respecting its encouragement, to contemplate the subject under some additional aspects, tending not only to confirm the idea that this kind of industry has been improperly represented as unproductive in itself, but to evince, in addition, that the establishment and diffusion of manufactures have the effect of rendering the total mass of useful and productive labor, in a community, greater than it would otherwise be. In prosecuting this discussion, it may be necessary briefly to resume and review some of the topics which have been already touched.

To affirm that the labor of the manufacturer is unproductive, because he consumes as much of the produce of land as he adds value to the raw materials which he manufactures, is not better founded than it would be to affirm that the labor of the farmer, which furnishes materials to the manufacturer, is unproductive, because he consumes an equal value of manufactured articles. Each furnishes a certain portion of the produce of his labor to the other, and each destroys a correspondent portion of the produce of the labor of the other. In the mean time, the maintenance of two citizens, instead of one, is going on; the State has two members, instead of one; and they together consume twice the value of what is produced from the land. If, instead of a farmer and artificer, there were a farmer only, he would be under the necessity of devoting a part of his labor to the fabrication of clothing and other articles, which he would procure of the artificer, in the case of there being such a person, and of course he would be able to devote less labor to the cultivation of his farm, and would draw from it a proportionably less product. The whole quantity of production, in this state of things, in provisions, raw materials, and manufactures, would certainly not exceed in value the amount of what would be produced in provisions and raw materials only, if there were an artificer as well as a farmer. Again: if there were both an artificer and a farmer, the latter would be left at liberty to pursue exclusively the cultivation of his farm. A greater quantity of provisions and raw materials would of course be produced, equal, at least, as has been already observed, to the whole amount of the provisions, raw materials, and manufactures, which would exist on a contrary supposition. The artificer, at the same time, would be going on in the production of manufactured commodities, to an amount sufficient not only to repay the farmer in those commodities for the provisions and materials which were procured from him, but to furnish the artificer himself with a supply of similar commodities for his own use. Thus, then, there would be two quantities or values in existence, instead of one; and the revenue and consumption would be double in one case what it would be in the other.

If, in place of both these suppositions, there were supposed to be two farmers and no artificer, each of whom applied a part of his labor to the culture of land, and another part to the fabrication of manufactures; in this case, the portion of the labor of both bestowed upon land would produce the same quantity of provisions and raw materials only, as would be produced by the entire sum of the labor of one applied in the same manner, and the portion of the labor of both bestowed upon manufactures, would produce the same quantities of manufactures only, as would be produced by the entire sum of the labor of one applied in the same manner. Hence, the produce of the labor of the two farmers would not be greater than the produce of the labor of the farmer and artificer; and hence it results, that the labor of the artificer is as positively productive as that of the farmer, and, as positively, augments the revenue of the society.

The labor of the artificer replaces to the farmer that portion of his labor with which he provides the materials of exchange with the artificer, and which he would otherwise have been compelled to apply to manufactures; and while the artificer thus enables the farmer to enlarge his stock of agricultural industry, a portion of which he purchases for his own use, he also supplies himself with the manufactured articles of which he stands in need. He does still more; besides this equivalent, which he gives for the portion of agricultural labor consumed by him, and this supply of manufactured commodities for his own consumption, he furnishes still a surplus, which compensates for the use of the capital advanced either by himself or some other person, for carrying on the business. This is the ordinary profit of the stock employed in the manufactory, and is, in every sense, as effective an addition to the income of the society as the rent of land.

The produce of the labor of the artificer, consequently, may be regarded as composed of three parts; one by which the provisions for his subsistence and the materials for his work are purchased of the farmer, one by which he supplies himself with manufactured necessities, and a third which constitutes the profit on the stock employed. The two last portions seem to have been overlooked in the system, which represents manufacturing industry as barren and unproductive.

In the course of the preceding illustrations, the products of equal quantity of the labor of the farmer and artificer have been treated as if equal to each other. But this is not to be understood as intending to assert any such precise equality. It is merely a manner of expression adopted for the sake of simplicity and perspicuity.

Whether the value of the produce of the labor of the farmer be somewhat more or less than that of the artificer, is not material to the main scope of the argument which hitherto has only aimed at showing that the one, as well as the other, occasions a positive augmentation of the total produce and revenue of the society.

It is now proper to proceed a step further, and to enumerate the principal circumstances, from which it may be inferred. That manufacturing establishments not only occasion a positive augmentation of the produce and revenue of the society, but that they contribute essentially to rendering them greater than they could possibly be, without such establishments.

These circumstances are—

1. The division of labor.
2. An extension of the use of machinery.
3. Additional employment to classes of the community not ordinarily engaged in the business.
4. The promoting of emigration from foreign countries.
5. The furnishing greater scope for the diversity of talents and dispositions which discriminate men from each other.
6. The affording a more ample and various field for enterprise.
7. The creating, in some instances, a new, and securing in all, a more certain and steady demand for the surplus produce of the soil.

Each of these circumstances has a considerable influence upon the total mass of industrious effort in a community; together, they add to it a degree of energy and effect, which are not easily conceived. Some comments upon each of them, in the order in which they have been stated, may serve to explain their importance.

I. As to the division of labor. It has justly been observed, that there is scarcely any thing of greater moment in the economy of a nation, than the proper division of labor. The separation of occupations causes each to be carried to a much greater perfection than it could possibly acquire, if they were blended. This arises, principally, from three circumstances.

1st. The greater skill and dexterity naturally resulting from a constant and undivided application to a single object. It is evident that these properties must increase, in proportion to the separation and simplification of objects and the steadiness of the attention devoted to each; and must be less, in proportion to the complication of objects, and the number among which the attention is distracted.

2d. The economy of time, by avoiding the loss of it, incident to a frequent transition from one operation to another of a different nature. This depends on various circumstances; the transition itself, the orderly disposition of the implements, machines, and materials employed in the operation to be relinquished, the preparatory steps to the commencement of a new one, the interruption of the impulse, which the mind of the workman acquires, from being engaged in a particular operation; the distractions, hesitations, and reluctance, which attended the passage from one kind of business to another.

3d. An extension of the use of machinery. A man occupied on a single object will have it more in his power, and will be more naturally led to exert his imagination devising methods to facilitate and abridge labor than if he were perplexed by a variety of independent and dissimilar operations. Besides this, the fabrication of machines, in numerous instances, becoming itself a distinct trade, the artist who follows it, has all the advantages, which have been enumerated for improvement in his particular art, and in both ways the invention and application of machinery are extended.

And from these causes united, the mere separation of the occupation of the cultivator from that of the artificer, has the effect of augmenting the productive powers of labor, and with them, the total mass of the produce or revenue of a country. In this single view of the subject, therefore, the utility of artificers or manufacturers, towards promoting an increase of productive industry, is apparent.

II. As to an extension of the use of machinery, a point which, though partly anticipated, requires to be placed in one or two additional lights.

The employment of machinery forms an item of great importance in the general mass of national industry. It is an artificial force, brought in aid of the natural force of man; and, to all the purposes of labor, is an increase of hands; an accession of the strength, unincumbered too, by the expense of maintaining the laborer. May it not, therefore, be fairly inferred, that those occupations, which give greatest scope to the use of this auxiliary, contribute most to the general stock of industrious effort, and, in consequence, to the general product of industry?

It shall be taken for granted, and the truth of the position referred to observation, that manufacturing pursuits are susceptible in a greater degree of the application of machinery, than those of agriculture. If so, all the difference is lost to a community, which, instead of manufacturing for itself, procures the fabrics requisite to its supply from other countries. The substitution of foreign for domestic manufactures is a transfer to foreign nations of the advantages accruing from the employment of machinery, in the modes in which it is capable of being employed, with most utility and to the greatest extent.

The cotton mill invented in England, within the last twenty years, is a signal illustration of the general proposition, which has been just advanced. In consequence of it, all the different processes for spinning cotton are performed by means of machines, which are put in motion by water, and attended chiefly by women and children; and by a smaller number of persons, in the whole, than are requisite in the ordinary mode of spinning. And it is an advantage of great moment that the operations of this mill continue, with convenience, during the night, as well as through the day. The prodigious effect of such a machine is easily conceived. To this invention is to be attributed, essentially, the immense progress which has been so suddenly made in Great Britain, in the various fabrics of cotton.

III. As to the additional employment of classes of the community, not originally engaged in the particular business.

This is not among the least valuable of the means by which manufacturing institutions contribute to augment the general stock of industry and production. In places where those institutions prevail, besides the persons regularly engaged in them, they afford occasional and extra employment to industrious individuals and families who are willing to devote the leisure resulting from the intermissions of their ordinary pursuits to collateral labors, as a resource for multiplying their acquisitions or their enjoyments. The husbandman himself experiences a new source of profit and support from the increased industry of his wife and daughters; invited and stimulated by the demands of the neighboring manufactories.

Besides this advantage of occasional employment to classes having different occupations, there is another of a nature allied to it, and of a similar tendency. This is the employment of persons who would otherwise be idle, (and in many cases a burden on the community,) either from the bias of temper, habit, infirmity of body, or some other cause, indisposing or disqualifying them for the toils of the country. It is worthy of particular remark, that, in general, women and children are rendered more useful, and the latter more early useful, by manufacturing establishments, than they would otherwise be. Of the number of persons employed in the cotton manufactories of Great Britain, it is computed that four-sevenths, nearly, are women and children; of whom the greatest proportion are children, and many of them of a tender age.

And thus it appears to be one of the attributes of manufactures, and one of no small consequence, to give occasion to the exertion of a greater quantity of industry, even by the same number of persons, where they happen to prevail, than would exist, if there were no such establishments.

IV. As to the promoting of emigration from foreign countries.

Men reluctantly quit one course of occupation and livelihood for another, unless invited to it by very apparent and proximate advantages. Many who would go from one country to another, if they had a prospect of continuing, with more benefit, the callings to which they have been educated, will often not be tempted to change their situation by the hope of doing better in some other way. Manufacturers who, listening to the powerful invitations of a better price for their fabrics or their labor, of greater cheapness of provisions and raw materials, of an exemption from the chief part of the taxes, burdens, and restraints, which they endure in the Old World, of greater personal independence and consequence, under the operation of a more equal Government; and of what is far more precious than mere religious toleration, a perfect equality of religious privileges; would, probably, flock from Europe to the United States to pursue their own trades or professions, if they were once made sensible of the advantages they would enjoy, and were inspired with an assurance of encouragement and employment, will, with difficulty, be induced to transplant themselves, with a view to becoming cultivators of land.

If it be true, then, that it is the interest of the United States to open every possible avenue to emigration from abroad, it affords a weighty argument for the encouragement of manufactures; which, for the reason just assigned, will have the strongest tendency to multiply the inducements to it. Here is perceived an important resource, not only for extending the population, and with it the useful and productive labor of the country, but likewise for the prosecution of manufactures, without deducting from the number of hands which might otherwise be drawn to tillage, and even for the indemnification of agriculture for such as might happen to be diverted from it. Many, whom manufacturing views would induce to emigrate, would afterwards yield to the temptations, which the particular situation of this country holds out to agricultural pursuits. And while agriculture would, in other respects, derive many signal and unmingled advantages, from the growth of manufactures, it is a problem whether it would gain or lose, as to the article of the number of persons employed in carrying it on.

V. As to the furnishing greater scope for the diversity of talents and dispositions, which discriminate men from each other.

This is a much more powerful mean of augmenting the fund of national industry than may at first sight appear. It is a just observation, that the minds of the strongest and most active powers for their proper objects fall below mediocrity and labor without effect, if confined to uncongenial pursuits. And it is thence to be inferred, that the results of human exertion may be immensely increased by diversifying its objects. When all the different kinds of industry obtain in a community, each individual can find his proper element, and can call into activity the whole vigor of his nature. And the community is benefited by the services of its respective members, in the manner in which each can serve it with most effect.

If there be any thing in a remark often to be met with, namely: that there is, in the genius of the people of this country, a peculiar aptitude for mechanic improvements, it would operate as a forcible reason for giving opportunities to the exercise of that species of talent, by the propagation of manufactures.

VI. As to the affording a more ample and various field for enterprise.

This, also, is of greater consequence in the general scale of national exertion, than might, perhaps, on a superficial view be supposed, and has effects not altogether dissimilar from those of the circumstance last noticed. To cherish and stimulate the activity of the human mind, by multiplying the objects of enterprise, is not among the least considerable of the expedients, by which the wealth of a nation may be promoted. Even things in themselves, not positively advantageous, sometimes become so, by their tendency to provoke exertion. Every new scene which is opened to the busy nature of man to rouse and exert itself, is the addition of a new energy to the general stock of effort.

The spirit of enterprise, useful and prolific as it is, must necessarily be contracted or expanded in proportion to the simplicity or variety of the objects.

occupations and productions, which are to be found in a society. It must be less in a nation of mere cultivators, than in a nation of cultivators and merchants; less in a nation of cultivators and merchants, than in a nation of cultivators, artificers, and merchants.

VII. As to the creating, in some instances, a new, and securing in all a more certain and steady demand for the surplus produce of the soil.

This is among the most important of the circumstances which has been indicated. It is a principal mean by which the establishment of manufactures contributes to an augmentation of the produce or revenue of a country, and has an immediate and direct relation to the prosperity of agriculture.

It is evident that the exertions of the husbandman will be steady or fluctuating, vigorous or feeble, in proportion to the steadiness or fluctuation, adequateness or inadequateness of the markets on which he must depend, for the vent of the surplus, which may be produced by his labor; and that such surplus in the ordinary course of things will be greater or less in the same proportion.

For the purpose of this vent, a domestic market is greatly to be preferred to a foreign one; because it is, in the nature of things, far more to be relied upon.

It is a primary object of the policy of nations to be able to supply themselves with subsistence from their own soils; and manufacturing nations, as far as circumstances permit, endeavor to procure, from the same source, the raw materials necessary for their own fabrics. This disposition, urged by the spirit of monopoly, is sometimes even carried to an injudicious extreme. It seems not always to be recollected that nations who have neither mines nor manufactures, can only obtain the manufactured articles of which they stand in need, by an exchange of the products of their soils; and that, if those who can best furnish them with such articles are unwilling to give a due course to this exchange, they must, of necessity, make every possible effort to manufacture for themselves; the effect of which is, that the manufacturing nations abridge the natural advantages of their situation, through an unwillingness to permit the agricultural countries to enjoy the advantages of theirs, and sacrifice the interests of a mutually beneficial intercourse to the vain project of selling every thing and buying nothing.

But it is also a consequence of the policy which has been noted, that the foreign demand for the products of agricultural countries is, in a great degree, rather casual and occasional, than certain or constant. To what extent injurious interruptions of the demand for some of the staple commodities of the United States may have been experienced from that cause, must be referred to the judgment of those who are engaged in carrying on the commerce of the country; but it may be safely affirmed, that such interruptions are at times very inconveniently felt; and that cases not unfrequently occur, in which markets are so confined and restricted, as to render the demand very unequal to the supply.

Report on Manufactures.

Independently, likewise, of the artificial impediments, which are created by the policy in question, there are natural causes tending to render the external demand for the surplus of agricultural nations a precarious reliance. The differences of seasons, in the countries which are the consumers, make immense differences in the produce of their own soils, in different years; and, consequently, in the degrees of their necessity for foreign supply. Plentiful harvests with them, especially if similar ones occur at the same time in the countries which are the furnishers, occasion, of course, a glut in the markets of the latter.

Considering how fast and how much the progress of new settlements of the United States must increase the surplus produce of the soil, and weighing seriously the tendency of the system, which prevails among most of the commercial nations of Europe; whatever dependence may be placed on the force of natural circumstances to counteract the effects of an artificial policy, there appear strong reasons to regard the foreign demand for that surplus as too uncertain, in a reliance, and to desire a substitute for it, in an extensive domestic market.

To secure such a market, there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers who constitute the most numerous class, after the cultivators of land, are, for that reason, the principal consumers of the surplus of their labors.

This idea of an extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, is of the first consequence. It is of all things, that which most effectually conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture. If the effect of manufactures should be to detach a portion of the hands which would otherwise be engaged in tillage, it might possibly cause a smaller quantity of land to be under cultivation; but by their tendency to procure a more certain demand for the surplus produce of the soil, they would, at the same time, cause the lands which were in cultivation, to be better improved and more productive. And while, by their influence, the condition of each individual farmer would be meliorated, the total mass of agricultural production would probably be increased. For this must evidently depend as much, if not more, upon the degree of improvement, than upon the number of acres under culture.

It merits particular observation, that the multiplication of manufactures not only furnishes a market for those articles which have been accustomed to be produced in abundance in a country, but it likewise creates a demand for such as were either unknown or produced in considerable quantities. The bowels as well as the surface of the earth, are ransacked for articles which were before neglected. Animals, plants, and minerals acquire a utility and value, which were before unexplored.

The foregoing considerations seem sufficient to establish the propositions, that it is the interest of nations to diversify the industrious pursuits of the individuals who compose them; that the establishment of manufactures is calculated, not only to increase the general stock of useful and productive labor, but even to improve the state of agriculture in particular, certainly to advance the interests of those who are engaged in it. There are other views, that will be hereafter taken of the subject, which, it is conceived, will serve to confirm these inferences.

Previously to a further discussion of the objections to the encouragement of manufactures which have been stated, it will be of use to see what can be said in reference to the particular situation of the United States, against the conclusions appearing to result from what has been already offered.

It may be observed, and the idea is of no inconsiderable weight, that however true it might be, that a State, which, possessing large tracts of vacant and fertile territory, was at the same time secluded from foreign commerce, would find its interest and the interest of agriculture, in diverting a part of its population from tillage to manufactures; yet it will not follow, that the same is true of a State, which, having such vacant and fertile territory, has at the same time ample opportunity of procuring from abroad, on good terms, all the fabrics of which it stands in need, for the supply of its inhabitants. The power of doing this at least secures the great advantage of a division of labor, leaving the farmer free to pursue exclusively the culture of his land, and enabling him to procure with its products the manufactured supplies requisite either to his wants or to his enjoyments. And though it should be true, that in settled countries, the diversification of industry is conducive to an increase in the productive powers of labor, and to an augmentation of revenue and capital, yet it is scarcely conceivable that there can be anything of so solid and permanent advantage to an uncultivated and unpeopled country, as to convert its wastes into cultivated and inhabited districts. If the revenue, in the mean time, should be less, the capital, in the event, must be greater.

To these observations, the following appears to be a satisfactory answer:

1. If the system of perfect liberty to industry and commerce were the prevailing system of nations, the arguments which dissuade a country, in the predicament of the United States, from the zealous pursuit of manufactures would doubtless have great force. It will not be affirmed, that they might not be permitted, with few exceptions, to serve as a rule of national conduct. In such a state of things, each country would have the full benefit of its peculiar advantages to compensate for its deficiencies or disadvantages. If one nation were in condition to supply manufactured articles on better terms than another, that other might find an abundant indemnification in a superior capacity to furnish the produce of the soil. And a free exchange mutually beneficial of the commodities which each was able to supply on the best terms, might be carried on between them, supporting in full vigor the industry of each. And though the circumstances which have been mentioned, and others which will be unfolded hereafter, render it probable, that nations merely agricultural, would not enjoy the same degree of opulence, in proportion to their numbers, as those which united manufactures with agriculture; yet the progressive improvement of the lands of the former, might in the end, atone for an inferior degree of opulence in the mean time; and in a case, in which opposite considerations are pretty equally balanced, the option ought perhaps always to be, in favor of leaving industry to its own direction.

But the system, which has been mentioned, is far from characterizing the general policy of nations. The prevalent one has been regulated by an opposite spirit. The consequence of it is, that the United States are to a certain extent in the situation of a country precluded from foreign commerce. They can indeed, without difficulty, obtain from abroad the manufactured supplies, of which they are in want; but they experience numerous and very injurious impediments to the emission and vent of their own commodities. Nor is this the case in reference to a single foreign nation only. The regulations of several countries, with which we have the most extensive intercourse, throw serious obstructions in the way of the principal staples of the United States.

In such a position of things, the United States cannot exchange with Europe on equal terms; and the want of reciprocity, would render them the victim of a system which would induce them to confine their views to agriculture, and refrain from manufactures. A constant and increasing necessity on their part, for the commodities of Europe, and only a partial and occasional demand for their own, in return, could not but expose them to a state of impoverishment, compared with the opulence to which their political and natural advantages authorize them to aspire.

Remarks of this kind are not made in the spirit of complaint. It is for the nations, whose regulations are alluded to, to judge for themselves, whether by aiming at too much, they do not lose more than they gain. It is for the United States to consider by what means they can render themselves least dependent on the combinations, right or wrong, of foreign policy.

It is no small consolation, that already the measures which have embarrassed our trade, have accelerated internal improvements, which upon the whole have bettered our affairs. To diversify and extend these improvements, is the surest and safest method of indemnifying ourselves for any inconveniences, which those or similar measures have a tendency to beget. If Europe will not take from us the products of our soil, upon terms consistent with our interest, the natural remedy is to contract as fast as possible our wants of her. 2. The conversion of their waste into cultivated lands is certainly a point of great moment in the political calculations of the United States. But the degree in which this may possibly be retarded by the encouragement of manufactures does not appear to counterbalance the powerful inducements to affording that encouragement.

An observation made in another place is of a nature to have great influence upon this question. If it cannot be denied that the interests even of agriculture may be advanced more by having such of the lands of a State as are occupied under good cultivation, than by having a greater quantity occupied under a much inferior cultivation, and if manufactures, for the reasons assigned, must be admitted to have a tendency to promote a more steady and vigorous cultivation of the lands occupied, than would happen without them, it will follow that they are capable of indemnifying a country for a diminution of the progress of new settlements; and may serve to increase both the capital value and the income of its lands, even though they should abridge the number of acres under tillage.

But it does by no means follow, that the progress of new settlements would be retarded by the extension of manufactures. The desire of being an independent proprietor of land is founded on such strong principles in the human breast, that where the opportunity of becoming so is as great as it is in the United States, the proportion will be small of those, whose situations would otherwise lead to it, who would be diverted from it towards manufactures. And it is highly probable, as already intimated, that the accessions of foreigners, who originally drawn over by manufacturing views would afterwards abandon them for agricultural, would be more than an equivalent for those of our own citizens, who might happen to be detached from them.

The remaining objections to a particular encouragement of manufactures in the United States now require to be examined.

One of these turn on the proposition that industry, if left to itself, will naturally find its way to the most useful and profitable employment: whence it is inferred, that manufactures, without the aid of Government, will grow up as soon and as fast as the natural state of things and the interest of the community may require.

Against the solidity of this hypothesis, in the full latitude of the terms, very cogent reasons may be offered. These have relation to the strong influence of habit and the spirit of imitation, the fear of want of success in untried enterprises, the intrinsic difficulties incident to first essays towards a competition with those who have previously attained to perfection in the business to be attempted, the bounties, premiums, and other artificial encouragements, with which foreign nations second the exertions of their own citizens in the branches in which they are to be rivalled.

Experience teaches that men are often so much governed by what they are accustomed to see and practice, that the simplest and most obvious improvements, in the most ordinary occupations, are adopted with hesitation, reluctance, and by slow gradations. The spontaneous transition to new pursuits, in a community long habituated to different ones, may be expected to be attended with proportionably greater difficulty. When former occupations ceased to yield a profit adequate to the subsistence of their followers, or when there was an absolute deficiency of employment in them, owing to the superabundance of hands, changes would ensue; but these changes would be likely to be more tardy than might consist with the interest either of individuals or of the society. In many cases they would not happen, while a bare support could be insured by an adherence to ancient courses; though a resort to a more profitable employment might be practicable. To produce the desirable changes as early as may be expedient, may therefore require the incitement and patronage of Government.

The apprehension of failing in new attempts is perhaps a more serious impediment. There are dispositions apt to be attracted by the mere novelty of an undertaking; but these are not always those best calculated to give it success. To this, it is of importance that the confidence of cautious, sagacious capitalists, both citizens and foreigners, should be excited. And to inspire this description of persons with confidence, it is essential that they should be made to see in any project, which is new, and for that reason alone, if for no other, precarious, the prospect of such a degree of countenance and support from Government, as may be capable of overcoming the obstacles, inseparable from first experiments.

The superiority antecedently enjoyed by nations, who have pre-occupied and perfected a branch of industry, constitutes a more formidable obstacle than either of those which have been mentioned, to the introduction of the same branch into a country in which it did not before exist. To maintain, between the recent establishments of one country and the long matured establishments of another country, a competition upon equal terms, both as to quality and price, is in most cases impracticable. The disparity in the one, or in the other, or in both, must necessarily be so considerable as to forbid a successful rivalry, without the extraordinary aid and protection of Government.

But the greatest obstacle of all to the successful prosecution of a new branch of industry in a country in which it was before unknown, consists, as far as the instances apply, in the bounties, premiums, and other aids which are granted, in a variety of cases, by the nations in which the establishments to be imitated are previously introduced. It is well known (and particularly examples in the course of this Report will be cited) that certain nations grant bounties on the exportation of particular commodities to enable their own workmen to undersell and supplant all competitors in the countries to which those commodities are sent. Hence the undertakers of a new manufacture have to contend, not only with the natural disadvantages of a new undertaking, but with the gratuities and remunerations which other Governments bestow. To be enabled to contend with success, it is evident that the interference and aid of their own Government are indispensable.

Combinations by those engaged in a particular branch of business in one country, to frustrate the first efforts to introduce it into another, by temporary sacrifices, recompensed perhaps by extraordinary indemnifications of the Government of such country, are believed to have existed, and are not to be regarded as destitute of probability.

The existence or assurance of aid from the Government of the country in which the business is to be introduced, may be essential to fortify adventurers against the dread of such combinations, to defeat their effects, if formed, and to prevent their being formed, by demonstrating that they must in the end prove fruitless.

Whatever room there may be for an expectation that the industry of a people, under the direction of private interest, will upon equal terms find out the most beneficial employment for itself, there is none for a reliance that it will struggle against the force of unequal terms, or will of itself surmount all the adventitious barriers to a successful competition, which may have been erected either by the advantages naturally acquired from practice and previous possession of the ground, or by those which may have sprung from positive regulations and an artificial policy. This general reflection might alone suffice as an answer to the objection under examination—exclusively of the weighty considerations which have been particularly urged.

The objections to the pursuit of manufactures in the United States which next present themselves to discussion, represent an impracticability of success, arising from three causes: scarcity of hands, dearth of labor, want of capital.

The two first circumstances are to a certain extent real, and, within due limits, ought to be admitted as obstacles to the success of manufacturing enterprise in the United States. But there are various considerations which lessen their force, and tend to afford an assurance that they are not sufficient to prevent the advantageous prosecution of many very useful and extensive manufactures.

With regard to scarcity of hands, the fact itself must be applied with no small qualification to certain parts of the United States. There are large districts, which may be considered as pretty fully peopled; and which, notwithstanding a continual drain for distant settlement, are thickly interspersed with flourishing and increasing towns. If these districts have not already reached the point at which the complaint of scarcity of hands ceases, they are not remote from it, and are approaching fast towards it; and, having perhaps fewer attractions to agriculture than some other parts of the Union, they exhibit a proportionably stronger tendency towards other kinds of industry. In these districts may be discerned no inconsiderable maturity for manufacturing establishments.

But there are circumstances which have been already noticed with another view, that materially diminish every where the effect of a scarcity of hands. These circumstances are the great use which can be made of women and children; on which point a very pregnant and instructive fact has been mentioned; the vast extension given by late improvements to the employment of machines, which, substituting the agency of fire and water, has prodigiously lessened the necessity for manual labor; the employment of persons ordinarily engaged in other occupations during the seasons, or hours of leisure, which, besides giving occasion to the exertion of a greater quantity of labor by the same number of persons, and thereby increasing the general stock of labor, as has been elsewhere remarked, may also be taken into the calculation as a resource for obviating the scarcity of hands; lastly, the attraction of foreign emigrants. Whoever inspects with a careful eye the composition of our towns, will be made sensible to what an extent this resource may be relied upon. This exhibits a large proportion of ingenious and valuable workmen, in different arts and trades, who by expatriating from Europe have improved their own condition, and added to the industry and wealth of the United States. It is a natural inference, from the experience we have already had, that, as soon as the United States shall present the countenance of a serious prosecution of manufactures, as soon as foreign artists shall be made sensible that the state of things here affords a moral certainty of employment and encouragement, competent numbers of European workmen will transplant themselves, effectually to insure the success of the design. How, indeed, can it otherwise happen, considering the various and powerful inducements which the situation of this country offers; addressing themselves to so many strong passions and feelings, to so many general and particular interests?

It may be affirmed, therefore, in respect to hands for carrying on manufactures, that we shall in a great measure trade upon a foreign stock—reserving our own for the cultivation of our lands, and the manning of our ships, as far as character and circumstances shall incline. It is not unworthy of remark, that the objection to the success of manufactures, deduced from the scarcity of hands, is alike applicable to trade and navigation, and yet these are perceived to flourish without any sensible impediment from that cause.

As to the dearthness of labor, (another of the obstacles alleged,) this has relation principally to two circumstances; one, that which has been just discussed, or the scarcity of hands; the other, the greatness of profits.

As far as it is a consequence of the scarcity of hands, it is mitigated by all the considerations which have been adduced as lessening that deficiency. It is certain, too, that the disparity in this respect, between some of the most manufacturing parts of Europe and a large proportion of the United States, is not nearly so great as is commonly imagined. It is also much less in regard to artificers and manufacturers than in regard to country laborers; and, while a careful comparison shows that there is in this particular much exaggeration, it is also evident that the effect of the degree of disparity which does truly exist, is diminished in proportion to the use which can be made of machinery.

To illustrate this last idea, let it be supposed that the difference of price in two countries, of a given quantity of manual labor requisite to the fabrication of a given article is as ten, and that some mechanic power is introduced into both countries, which, performing half the necessary labor, leaves only half to be done by hand, it is evident that the difference in the cost of the fabrication of the article in question in the two countries, as far as it is connected with the price of labor, will be reduced from ten to five, in consequence of the introduction of that power.

This circumstance is worthy of the most particular attention. It diminishes immensely one of the objections most strenuously urged against the success of manufactures in the United States.

To procure all such machines as are known in any part of Europe, can only require a proper provision and due pains. The knowledge of several of the most important of them is already possessed. The preparation of them here is, in most cases, practicable on nearly equal terms. As far as they depend on water, some superiority of advantage may be claimed, from the uncommon variety and greater cheapness of situations adapted to mills seats, with which different parts of the United States abound.

So far as the dearthness of labor may be a consequence of the greatness of profits in any branch of business, it is no obstacle to its success. The undertaker can afford to pay the price.

There are grounds to conclude that undertakers of manufactures in this country can at this time afford to pay higher wages to the workmen they may employ than are paid to similar workmen in Europe. The prices of foreign fabrics in the markets of the United States, which will for a long time regulate the prices of domestic ones, may be considered as compounded of the following ingredients: the first cost of materials, including taxes, if any, which are paid upon them where they are made; the expense of grounds, buildings, machinery, and tools; the wages of the persons employed in the manufactory; the profits on the capital stock so employed; the commissions of agents to purchase them where they are made; the expense of transportation to the United States, including insurance and other incidental charges; the taxes or duties, if any, and fees of office which are paid on their exportation; the taxes or duties, and fees of office, which are paid on their importation.

As to the first of these items, the cost of materials, the advantage, upon the whole, is at present on the side of the United States, and the difference in their favor must increase in proportion as a certain and extensive domestic demand shall induce the proprietors of land to devote more of their attention to the production of those materials. It ought not to escape observation, in a comparison on this point, that some of the principal manufacturing countries of Europe are much more dependent on foreign supply for the materials of their manufactures, than would be the United States, who are capable of supplying themselves with a greater abundance as well as a greater variety of the requisite materials.

As to the second item, the expense of grounds, buildings, machinery, and tools, an equality at least may be assumed; since advantages in some particulars will counterbalance temporary disadvantages in others.

As to the third item, or the article of wages, the comparison certainly turns against the United States; though, as before observed, not in so great a degree as is commonly supposed.

The fourth item is alike applicable to the foreign and to the domestic manufactory. It is, indeed, more properly a result than a particular to be compared.

But, with respect to all the remaining items, they are alone applicable to the foreign manufactory, and in the strictest sense extraordinary; constituting a sum of extra charge on the foreign fabric, which cannot be estimated at less than from fifteen to thirty per cent. on the cost of it at the manufactory.

This sum of extra charge may confidently be regarded as more than a counterpoise for the real difference in the price of labor, and is a satisfactory proof that manufactures may prosper in defiance of it in the United States.

To the general allegation, connected with the circumstances of scarcity of hands and dearthness of labor, that extensive manufactures can only grow out of a redundant or full population, it will be sufficient to answer, generally, that the fact has been otherwise; that the situation alleged to be an essential condition of success, has not been that of several nations, at periods when they had already attained to maturity in a variety of manufactures.

The supposed want of capital for the prosecution of manufactures in the United States, is the most indefinite of the objections which are usually opposed to it. It is very difficult to pronounce anything precise concerning the real extent of the moneyed capital of a country, and still more concerning the proportion which it bears to the objects that invite the employment of capital. It is not less difficult to pronounce how far the effect of any given quantity of money, as capital, or, in other words, as a medium for circulating the industry and property of a nation, may be increased by the very circumstance of the additional motion which is given to it by new objects of employment. That effect, like the momentum of descending bodies, may not improperly be represented as in a compound ratio to mass and velocity. It seems pretty certain, that a given sum of money, in a situation in which the quick impulses of commercial activity were little felt, would appear inadequate to the circulation of as great a quantity of industry and property, as in one in which their full influence was experienced.

It is not obvious, why the same objection might not as well be made to external commerce as to manufactures, since it is manifest that our immense tracts of land, occupied and unoccupied, are capable of giving employment to more capital than is actually bestowed upon them. It is certain that the United States offer a vast field for the advantageous employment of capital, but it does not follow that there will not be found, in one way or another, a sufficient fund for the successful prosecution of any species of industry which is likely to prove truly beneficial.

The following considerations are of a nature to remove all inquietude on the score of want of capital. The introduction of banks, as has been shown on another occasion, has a powerful tendency to extend the active capital of a country. Experience of the utility of these institutions, is multiplying them in the United States. It is probable that they will be established wherever they can be supported, if administered with prudence, they will add new energies to all pecuniary operations. The aid of foreign capital may safely, and with considerable latitude, be taken into calculation. Its instrumentality has been long experienced in our external commerce; and it has begun to be felt in various other modes. Not only our own funds, but our agriculture and other internal improvements, have been animated by it. It has already, in a few instances, extended even to our manufactures. It is a well known fact, that there are parts of Europe which have more capital than profitable domestic objects of employment. Hence, among other proofs, the large loans continually furnished to foreign States. And it is equally certain that the capital of other parts may find more profitable employment in the United States than at home. And notwithstanding there are weighty inducements to prefer the employment of capital at home, even at less profit, to an investment of it abroad, though with greater gain, yet these inducements are overruled, either by a deficiency of employment, or by a very material difference in profit. Both these causes operate to produce a transfer of foreign capital to the United States. It is certain that various objects in this country hold out advantages which are with difficulty to be equalled elsewhere; and under the increasingly favorable impressions which are entertained of our Government, the attractions will become more and more strong. These impressions will prove a rich mine of prosperity to the country, if they are confirmed and strengthened by the progress of our affairs. And to secure this advantage, little more is necessary than to foster industry, and cultivate order and tranquility, at home and abroad.

It is not impossible that there may be persons disposed to look with a jealous eye on the introduction of foreign capital, as if it were an instrument to deprive our citizens of the profits of our own industry; but, perhaps, there never could be a more unreasonable jealousy. Instead of being viewed as a rival, it ought to be considered as a most valuable auxiliary, conducting to put in motion a greater quantity of productive labor, and a greater portion of useful enterprise, than could exist without it. It is at least evident, that in a country situated like the United States, with an infinite fund of resources yet to be unfolded, every farthing of foreign capital which is laid out in internal ameliorations, and in industrious establishments of a permanent nature, is a precious acquisition. And whatever be the objects which originally attract foreign capital, when once introduced it may be directed towards any purpose of beneficial exertion which is desired. And to detain it among us, there can be no expedient so effectual as to enlarge the sphere within which it may be usefully employed: though introduced merely with views to speculations in the funds, it may afterwards be rendered subservient to the interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures.

But the attraction of foreign capital for the direct purpose of manufactures, ought not to be deemed a chimerical expectation. There are already examples of it, as remarked in another place; and the examples, if the disposition be cultivated, can hardly fail to multiply. There are, also, instances of another kind, which serve to strengthen the expectation; enterprises for improving the public communications, by cutting canals, opening the obstructions in rivers, and erecting bridges, have received very material aid from the same source.

When the manufacturing capitalist of Europe shall advert to the many important advantages which have been intimated in the course of this Report, he cannot but perceive very powerful inducements to a transfer of himself and his capital to the United States. Among the reflections, which a most interesting peculiarity of situation is calculated to suggest, it cannot escape his observation, as a circumstance of moment in the calculation, that the progressive population and improvement of the United States, insure a continually increasing domestic demand for the fabrics which he shall produce; not to be affected by any external casualties or vicissitudes.

But while there are circumstances sufficiently strong to authorize a considerable degree of reliance on the aid of foreign capital, towards the attainment of the object in view, it is satisfactory to have good grounds of assurance that there are domestic resources of themselves adequate to it. It happens that there is a species of capital, actually existing within the United States, which relieves from all inquietude on the score of want of capital—this is the Funded Debt.

The effect of a Funded Debt, as a species of capital, has been noticed upon a former occasion; but a more particular elucidation of the point laid upon it: this shall accordingly be attempted. Public funds answer the purpose of capital from the estimation in which they are usually held by moneyed men, and consequently from the ease and despatch with which they can be turned into money. This capacity of prompt convertibility into money causes a transfer of stock to be in a great number of cases equivalent to a payment in coin; and where it does not happen to suit the party who is to receive, to accept a transfer of stock, the party who is to pay is never at a loss to find elsewhere a purchaser of his stock, who will furnish him in lieu of it with the coin of which he stands in need.

Hence in a sound and settled state of the public funds, a man possessed of a sum in them can embrace any scheme of business which offers with as much confidence as if he were possessed of an equal sum in coin.

This operation of public funds, as capital, is too obvious to be denied; but it is objected to the idea of their operating as an augmentation of the capital of the community that they serve to occasion the destruction of some other capital to an equal amount.

The capital which alone they can be supposed to destroy must consist of the annual revenue, which is applied to the payment of interest on the Debt, and to the gradual redemption of the principal. The amount of the coin, which is employed in circulating the funds, or, in other words, in effecting the different alienations which they undergo.

But the following appears to be the true and accurate view of this matter:

1. As to the point of the annual revenue requisite for the payment of interest and redemption of principal.

As a determinate proportion will tend to perspicuity in the reasoning, let it be supposed that the annual revenue to be applied corresponding with the modification of the six per cent. stock of the United States is in the ratio of eight upon the hundred; that is, in the first instance, six on account of interest, and two on account of principal.

Thus far it is evident that the capital destroyed to the capital created would bear no greater proportion than eight to one hundred. There would be withdrawn from the total mass of other capitals a sum of eight dollars to be paid to the public creditor, while he would be possessed of a sum of one hundred dollars, ready to be applied to any purpose, to be embarked in any enterprise which might appear to him eligible. Here, then, the augmentation of capital, or the excess of that which is produced beyond that which is destroyed, is equal to ninety-two dollars.

To this conclusion it may be objected, that the sum of eight dollars is to be withdrawn annually; until the whole hundred is extinguished; and it may be inferred that in process of time a capital will be destroyed equal to that which is at first created.

But it is nevertheless true that during the whole of the interval between the creation of the capital of one hundred dollars and its reduction to a sum not greater than that of the annual revenue appropriated to its redemption, there will be a greater active capital in existence than if no debt had been contracted. The sum drawn from other capitals in any one year will not exceed eight dollars; but there will be at every instant of time during the whole period in question a sum corresponding with so much of the principal as remains unredeemed in the hands of some person or other employed, or ready to be employed, in some profitable undertaking. There will therefore constantly be more capital in capacity to be employed than capital taken from employment. The excess for the first year has been stated to be ninety-two dollars; it will diminish yearly; but there always will be an excess until the principal of the Debt is brought to a level with the redeeming annuity; that is, in the case which has been assumed by way of example, to $8. The reality of this excess becomes palpable, if it be supposed, as often happens, that the citizen of a foreign country imports into the United States $100 for the purchase of an equal sum of Public Debt; here is an absolute augmentation of the mass of circulating coin to the extent of one hundred dollars. At the end of a year the foreigner is presumed to draw back eight dollars on account of his principal and interest, but he still leaves ninety-two of his original deposit in circulation, as he in like manner leaves eighty-four at the end of the second year, drawing back then also the annuity of eight dollars; and thus the matter proceeds; the capital left in circulation diminishing each year, and coming nearer to the level of the annuity drawn back. There, are however some differences in the ultimate operation of the part of the Debt, which is purchased by foreigners, and that which remains in the hands of citizens. But the general effect in each case, though in different degrees, is to add to the active capital of the country.

Hitherto the reasoning has proceeded on a conception of the position, that there is a destruction of some other capital to the extent of the annuity appropriated to the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal of the Debt; but in this too much has been conceded. There is at most a temporary transfer of some other capital, to the amount of the annuity, from those who pay, to the creditor who receives; which he again re-stores to the circulation to resume the offices of a capital. This he does either immediately by employing the money in some branch of industry, or immediately by lending it to some other person, who does so employ it, or by spending it on his own maintenance. In either supposition, there is no destruction of capital; there is nothing more than a suspension of its motion for a time; that is, while it is passing from the hands of those who pay into the public coffers and thence through the public creditor into some other channel of circulation. When the payments of interest are periodic and quick, and made by the instrumentality of banks, the diversion or suspension of capital may almost be denominated momentary. Hence the deduction on this account is far less than it at first sight appears to be.

There is evidently, as far as regards the annuity, no destruction or transfer of any other capital than that portion of the income of each individual, which goes to make up the annuity. The land which furnishes the farmer with the sum which he is to contribute remains the same; and the like may be observed of other capitals. Indeed, as far as the tax, which is the object of contribution (as frequently happens when it does not oppress by its weight) may have been a motive to greater exertion in any occupation; it may even serve to increase the contributory capital: this idea is not without importance in the general view of the subject.

It remains to see what further deduction ought to be made from the capital which is created by the existence of the Debt on account of the coin which is employed in its circulation. This is susceptible of much less precise calculation than the article which has been just discussed. It is impossible to say what proportion of coin is necessary to carry on the alienations which any species of property usually undergoes; the quantity, indeed, varies, according to circumstances. But it may still, without hesitation, be pronounced, from the quickness of the rotation, or rather of the transitions that the medium of circulation, always bears but a small proportion to the amount of the property circulated. And it is thence satisfactorily deducible that the coin employed in the negotiations of the funds, and which serve to give them activity as capital, is incomparably less than the sum of the Debt negotiated for the purpose of business.

It ought not, however, to be omitted, that the negotiation of the funds becomes itself a distinct business, which employs, and by employing diverts a portion of the circulating coin from other pursuits; but, making due allowance for this circumstance, there is no reason to conclude that the effect of the diversion of coin in the whole operation bears any considerable proportion to the amount of the capital to which it gives activity. The sum of the Debt in circulation is continually at the command of any useful enterprise; the coin itself which circulates it is never more than momentarily suspended from its ordinary functions. It experiences an incessant and rapid flux and reflux to and from the channels of industry to those of speculations in the funds.

There are strong circumstances in confirmation of this theory. The force of moneyed capital which has been displayed in Great Britain, and the height to which every species of industry has grown up under it, defy a solution from the quantity of coin which that Kingdom has ever possessed. Accordingly it has been coeval with its Funding System, the prevailing opinion of the men of business, and of the generality of the most sagacious theorists of that country, that the operation of the public funds as capital has contributed to the effect in question. Among ourselves appearances thus far favor the same conclusion. Industry in general seems to have been reanimated. There are symptoms indicating an extension of our commerce. Our navigation has certainly of late had a considerable spring; and there appears to be in many parts of the Union a command of capital, which, till lately, since the Revolution at least, was unknown. But it is at the same time to be acknowledged that other circumstances have concurred, and in a great degree, in producing the present state of things, and that the appearances are not yet sufficiently decisive to be entirely relied upon.

In the question under discussion, it is important to distinguish between an absolute increase of capital, or an accession of real wealth and an artificial increase of capital, as an engine of business, or as an instrument of industry and commerce. In the first sense, a Funded Debt has no pretensions to being deemed an increase of capital; in the last, it has pretensions which are not easy to be controverted. Of a similar nature is bank credit, and, in an inferior degree, every species of private credit.

But though a Funded Debt is not in the first instance an absolute increase of capital or an augmentation of real wealth, yet by serving as a new power in the operations of industry, it has, within certain bounds, a tendency to increase the real wealth of a community; in like manner as money borrowed by a thrifty farmer, to be laid out in the improvement of his farm may, in the end, add to his stock of real riches.

There are respectable individuals who, from a just aversion to an accumulation of Public Debt, are unwilling to concede to it any kind of utility, who can discern no good to alleviate the ill with which they suppose it pregnant, who cannot be persuaded that it ought in any sense to be viewed as an increase of capital, lest it should be inferred that the more debt the more capital—the greater the burdens the greater the blessings of the community.

But it interests the public councils to estimate every object as it truly is, to appreciate how far the good in any measure is compensated by the ill, or the ill by the good; either of them is seldom unmixed.

Neither will it follow that an accumulation of Debt is desirable, because a certain degree of it operates as capital. There may be a plethora in the political as in the natural body; there may be a state of things in which any such artificial capital is unnecessary. The Debt, too, may be swelled to such a size as that the greatest part of it may cease to be useful as a capital, serving only to pamper the dissipation of idle and dissolute individuals; as that the sums required to pay the interest upon it may become oppressive, and beyond the means which a Government can employ consistently with its tranquility to raise them; as that the resources of taxation to face the Debt may have been strained too far to admit of extensions adequate to exigencies which regard the public safety.

Where this critical point is, cannot be pronounced; but it is impossible to believe that there is not such a point.

And as the vicissitudes of nations beget a perpetual tendency to the accumulation of Debt, there ought to be in every Government a perpetual, anxious, and unceasing effort to reduce that, which at any time exists, as fast as shall be practicable, consistently with integrity and good faith.

Reasonings on a subject comprehending ideas so abstract and complex, so little reducible to precise calculation as those which enter into the question just discussed, are always attended with a danger of running into fallacies; due allowance ought therefore to be made for this possibility. But, as far as the nature of the subject admits of it, there appears to be satisfactory ground for a belief that the public funds operate as a resource of capital to the citizens of the United States, and if they are a resource at all, it is an extensive one.

To all the arguments which are brought to evince the impracticability of success in manufacturing establishments in the United States, it might have been a sufficient answer to have referred to the experience of what has been already done. It is certain that several important branches have grown up and flourished with a rapidity which surprises, affording an encouraging assurance of success in future attempts; of these it may not be improper to enumerate the most considerable:—

I. Of skins. Tanned and tawed leather, dressed skins, shoes, boots, and slippers; harness and saddlery of all kinds; portmanteaus and trunks; leather breeches, gloves, muffs, and tippets; parchment and glue.

II. Of iron. Bar and sheet iron, steel, nail rods, and nails; implements of husbandry; stoves, pots and other household utensils; the steel and iron work of carriages and for ship building; anchors, scale beams and weights, and various tools of artificers; arms of different kinds: though the manufacture of these last has of late diminished for want of demand.

III. Of wood. Ships, cabinet wares, and turnery; wool and cotton cards, and other machinery for manufactures and husbandry; mathematical instruments; coopers' wares of every kind.

IV. Of flax and hemp. Cables, sailcloth, cordage, twine, and packthread.

V. Bricks and coarse tiles, and potters' wares.

VI. Ardent spirits and malt liquors.

VII. Writing and printing paper, sheathing and wrapping paper, pasteboards, fullers or presspapers, paperhangings.

VIII. Hats of fur and wool and of mixtures of both. Women's stuff and silk shoes.

IX. Refined sugars.

X. Oils of animals and seeds; soap, spermaceti and tallow candles.

XI. Copper and brass wares, particularly utensils for distillers, sugar refiners, and brewers; andirons and other articles for household use; philosophical apparatus.

XII. Tin wares for most purposes of ordinary use.

XIII. Carriages of all kinds.

XIV. Snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco.

XV. Starch and hairpowder.

XVI. Lampblack, and other painters' colors.

XVII. Gunpowder.

Besides manufactures of these articles, which are carried on as regular trades, and have attained to a considerable degree of maturity, there is a vast scene of household manufacturing, which contributes more largely to the supply of the community than could be imagined without having made it an object of particular inquiry. This observation is the pleasing result of the investigation to which the subject of this Report has led, and is applicable as well to the Southern as to the Middle and Northern States. Great quantities of coarse cloths, coatings, serges, and flannels, linsey-woolseys, hosiery of wool, cotton, and thread, coarse fastians, jeans and muslins, checked and striped cotton and linen goods, bedticks, coverlets and counterpanes, tow linens, coarse shirtings, sheetings, toweling and table linen, and various mixtures of wool and cotton, and of cotton and flax, are made in the household way, and, in many instances, to an extent not only sufficient for the supply of the families in which they are made, but for sale, and even in some cases for exportation. It is computed, in a number of districts, that two-thirds, three-fourths, and even four-fifths of all the clothing of the inhabitants are made by themselves. The importance of so great a progress as appears to have been made in family manufactures, within a few years, both in a moral and political view, renders the fact highly interesting.

Neither does the above enumeration comprehend all the articles that are manufactured as regular trades. Many others occur, which are equally well established, but which not being of equal importance have been omitted. And there are many attempts, still in their infancy, which, though attended with very favorable appearances, could not have been properly comprised in an enumeration of manufactures already established. There are other articles, also, of great importance, which, though, strictly speaking, manufactures, are omitted, as being immediately connected with husbandry—such are flour, pot and pearl ash, pitch, turpentine, and the like.

There remains to be noticed an objection to the encouragement of manufactures, of a nature different from those which question the probability of success. This is derived from its supposed tendency to give a monopoly of advantages to particular classes, at the expense of the rest of the community, who, it is affirmed, would be able to procure the requisite supplies of manufactured articles on better terms, from foreigners than from our own citizens, and who, it is alleged, are reduced to a necessity of paying an enhanced price for whatever they want by every measure which obstructs the free competition of foreign commodities.

It is not an unreasonable supposition that measures which serve to abridge the free competition of foreign articles have a tendency to occasion an enhancement of prices, and it is not to be denied that such is the effect in a number of cases; but the fact does not uniformly correspond with the theory. A reduction of prices has, in several instances, immediately succeeded the establishment of a domestic manufacture. Whether it be that foreign manufacturers endeavor to supplant by underselling our own, or whatever else be the cause, the effect has been such as is stated, and the reverse of what might have been expected.

But though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than was the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away every thing like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience. Whence it follows, that it is the interest of the community, with a view to eventual and permanent economy, to encourage the growth of manufactures. In a national view, a temporary enhancement of price must always be well compensated by a permanent reduction of it.

It is a reflection which may with propriety be indulged here, that this eventual diminution of the prices of manufactured articles, which is the result of internal manufacturing establishments, has a direct and very important tendency to benefit agriculture. It enables the farmer to procure with a smaller quantity of his labor the manufactured produce of which he stands in need, and consequently increases the value of his income and property.

The objections which are commonly made to the expediency of encouraging and to the probability of succeeding in manufacturing pursuits in the United States, having now been discussed, the considerations which have appeared in the course of the discussion, recommending that species of industry to the patronage of the Government, will be materially strengthened by a few general and some particular topics, which have been naturally reserved for subsequent notice.

1. There seems to be a moral certainty that the trade of a country which is both manufacturing and agricultural will be more lucrative and prosperous than that of a country which is merely agricultural. One reason for this is found in that general effort of nations (which has been already mentioned) to procure from their own soils the articles of prime necessity requisite to their own consumption and use, and which serves to render their demand for a foreign supply of such articles in a great degree occasional and contingent. Hence, while the necessities of nations exclusively devoted to agriculture for the fabrics of manufacturing States are constant and regular, the wants of the latter for the products of the former are liable to very considerable fluctuations and interruptions. The great inequalities resulting from difference of seasons have been elsewhere remarked. This uniformity of demand on the one side, and unsteadiness of it on the other, must necessarily have a tendency to cause the general course of the exchange of commodities between the parties to turn to the disadvantage of the merely agricultural States. Peculiarity of situation, a climate and soil adapted to the production of peculiar commodities, may sometimes contradict the rule; but there is every reason to believe that it will be found in the main a just one.

Another circumstance which gives a superiority of commercial advantages to States that manufacture as well as cultivate, consists in the more numerous attractions which a more diversified market offers to foreign customers, and in the greater scope which it affords to mercantile enterprise. It is a position of indisputable truth in commerce, depending, too, on very obvious reasons, that the greatest resort will ever be to those marts where commodities, while equally abundant, are most various. Each difference of kind holds out an additional inducement; and it is a position not less clear, that the field of enterprise must be enlarged to the merchants of a country in proportion to the variety as well as the abundance of commodities which they find at home for exportation to foreign markets.

A third circumstance, perhaps not inferior to either of the other two, conferring the superiority which has been stated, has relation to the stagnations of demand for certain commodities which at some time or other interfere more or less with the sale of all. The nation which can bring to market but few articles is likely to be more quickly and sensibly affected by such stagnations than one which is always possessed of a great variety of commodities. The former frequently finds too great a portion of its stock of materials for sale or exchange lying on hand, or is obliged to make injurious sacrifices to supply its wants of foreign articles, which are numerous and urgent in proportion to the smallness of the number of its own. The latter commonly finds itself indemnified by the high prices of some articles for the low prices of others; and the prompt and advantageous sale of those articles which are in demand enables its merchants the better to wait for a favorable change in respect to those which are not. There is ground to believe that a difference of situation in this particular has immensely different effects upon the wealth and prosperity of nations.

From these circumstances, collectively, two important inferences are to be drawn—one, that there is always a higher probability of a favorable balance of trade in regard to countries in which manufactures, founded on the basis of a thriving agriculture, flourish, than in regard to those which are confined wholly or almost wholly to agriculture; the other (which is also a consequence of the first) that countries of the former description are likely to possess more pecuniary wealth, or money, than those of the latter.

Facts appear to correspond with this conclusion. The importations of manufactured supplies seem invariably to drain the merely agricultural people of their wealth. Let the situation of the manufacturing countries of Europe be compared in this particular with that of countries which only cultivate, and the disparity will be striking. Other causes, it is true, help to account for this disparity between some of them, and among these causes, the relative state of agriculture; but, between others of them, the most prominent circumstance of dissimilitude arises from the comparative state of manufactures. In corroboration of the same idea, it ought not to escape remark, that the West India Islands, the soils of which are the most fertile, and the nation which in the greatest degree supplies the rest of the world with precious metals, exchange to a loss with almost every other country. As far as experience at home may guide, it will lead to the same conclusion. Previous to the Revolution, the quantity of coin possessed by the Colonies which now compose the United States appeared to be inadequate to their circulation, and their debt to Great Britain was progressive. Since the Revolution, the States in which manufactures have most increased have recovered safest from the injuries of the late war, and abound most in pecuniary resources.

It ought to be admitted, however, in this, as in the preceding case, that causes irrelative to the state of manufactures, account, in a degree, for the phenomena remarked. The continual progress of new settlements has a natural tendency to occasion an unfavorable balance of trade, though it indemnifies for the inconvenience by that increase of the national capital which flows from the conversion of waste into improved lands; and the different degrees of external commerce which are carried on by the different States may make material differences in the comparative state of their wealth. The first circumstance has reference to the deficiency of coin and the increase of debt previous to the Revolution; the last to the advantages which the most manufacturing States appear to have enjoyed over the others since the termination of the late war. But the uniform appearance of an abundance of specie, as the concomitant of a flourishing state of manufactures, and of the reverse, where they do not prevail, afford a strong presumption of their favorable operation upon the wealth of a country. Not only the wealth, but the independence and security of a country, appear to be materially connected with the prosperity of manufactures. Every nation, with a view to those great objects, ought to endeavor to possess within itself all the essentials of national supply. These comprise the means of subsistence, habitation, clothing, and defence. The possession of these is necessary to the perfection of the body politic, to the safety as well as to the welfare of the society. The want of either is the want of an important organ of political life and motion; and in the various crises which await a State it must severely feel the effects of such deficiency. The extreme embarrassments of the United States during the late war from an incapacity of supplying themselves, are still matter of keen recollection. A future war might be expected again to exemplify the mischiefs and dangers of a situation to which that incapacity is still in too great a degree applicable, unless changed by timely and vigorous exertions. To effect this change, as fast as shall be prudent, merits all the attention and all the zeal of our public councils. It is the next great work to be accomplished. The want of a Navy to protect our external commerce, as long as it shall continue, must render it a peculiarly precarious reliance for the supply of essential articles, and must serve to strengthen prodigiously the arguments in favor of manufactures.

To these general considerations are added some of a more particular nature. Our distance from Europe, the great fountain of manufactured supplies, subjects us, in the existing state of things, to inconvenience and loss in two ways. The bulkiness of those commodities which are the chief productions of the soil, necessarily imposes very heavy charges on their transportation to distant markets. These charges, in the cases in which the nations to whom our products are sent, maintain a competition in the supply of their own markets, principally fall upon us, and form material deductions from the primitive value of the articles furnished. The charges on manufactured supplies brought from Europe are greatly enhanced by the same circumstance of distance. These charges, again, in the cases in which our own industry maintains no competition in our own markets, also principally fall upon us, and are an additional cause of extraordinary deduction from the primitive value of our own products, these being the materials of exchange for the foreign fabrics which we consume.

The equality and moderation of individual property, and the growing settlements of new districts, occasion, in this country, an unusual demand for coarse manufactures—the charges of which, being greater in proportion to their greater bulk, augment the disadvantage which has been just described.

As in most countries, domestic supplies maintain a very considerable competition with such foreign productions of the soil as are imported for sale. If the extensive establishment of manufactures in the United States does not create a similar competition in respect to manufactured articles, it appears to be clearly deducible, from the considerations which have been mentioned, that they must sustain a double loss in their exchanges with foreign nations, strongly conducive to an unfavorable balance of trade, and very prejudicial to their interests. These disadvantages press with no small weight on the landed interest of the country. In seasons of peace, they cause a serious deduction from the intrinsic value of the products of the soil. In the time of a war, which should either involve ourselves or another nation possessing a considerable share of our carrying trade, the charges on the transportation of our commodities, bulky as most of them are, could hardly fail to prove a grievous burden to the farmer, while obliged to depend in so great a degree as he now does, upon foreign markets for the vent of the surplus of his labor. As far as the prosperity of the fisheries of the United States is impeded by the want of an adequate market, there arises another special reason for desiring the extension of manufactures. Besides the fish, which, in many places, would be likely to make a part of the subsistence of the persons employed, it is known that the oils, bones, and skins, of marine animals are of extensive use in various manufactures. Hence the prospect of an additional demand for the produce of the fisheries.

One more point of view only remains, in which to consider the expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States. It is not uncommon to meet with an opinion, that though the promoting of manufactures may be the interest of a part of the Union, it is contrary to that of another part. The Northern and Southern regions are sometimes represented as having adverse interests in this respect. Those are called manufacturing, these agricultural States, and a species of opposition is imagined to subsist between the manufacturing and agricultural interests. This idea of an opposition between those two interests is the common error of the early periods of every country; but experience gradually dissipates it. Indeed, they are perceived so often to succor and to befriend each other, that they come at length to be considered as one—a supposition which has been frequently abused, and is not universally true. Particular encouragements of particular manufactures may be of a nature to sacrifice the interests of landholders to those of manufacturers; but it is nevertheless a maxim well established by experience, and generally acknowledged where there has been sufficient experience, that the “aggregate” prosperity of manufactures, and the “aggregate” prosperity of agriculture are intimately connected. In the course of the discussion which has had place, various weighty considerations have been adduced, operating in support of that maxim. Perhaps the superior steadiness of the demand of a domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, is alone a convincing argument of its truth. Ideas of a contrariety of interests between the Northern and Southern regions of the Union, are, in the main, as unfounded as they are mischievous. The diversity of circumstances on which such contrariety is usually predicated, authorizes a directly contrary conclusion. Mutual wants constitute one of the strongest links of political connexion, and the extent of these bears a natural proportion to the diversity in the means of mutual supply. Suggestions of an opposite complexion are ever to be deplored, as unfriendly to the steady pursuit of one great common cause, and to the perfect harmony of all the parts.

In proportion as the mind is accustomed to trace the intimate connexion of interest which subsists between all the parts of a society, united under the same Government, the infinite variety of channels which serve to circulate the prosperity of each to and through the rest, in that proportion it will be little apt to be disturbed by solicitudes and apprehensions which originate in local discriminations. It is a truth as important as it is agreeable, and one to which it is not easy to imagine exceptions, that everything tending to establish substantial and permanent order in the affairs of a country, to increase the total mass of industry and opulence, is ultimately beneficial to every part of it. On the credit of this great truth, an acquiescence may safely be accorded, from every quarter, to all institutions and arrangements which promise a confirmation of public order, and an augmentation of national resource.

But there are more particular considerations, which serve to fortify the idea that the encouragement of manufactures is the interest of all parts of the Union. If the Northern and Middle States should be the principal scenes of such establishments, they would immediately benefit the more Southern, by creating a demand for productions, some of which they have in common with the other States, and others of which are either peculiar to them, or more abundant, or of better quality than elsewhere. These productions, principally, are timber, flax, hemp, cotton, wool, raw silk, indigo, iron, lead, furs, hides, skins, and coals. Of these articles, cotton and indigo are peculiar to the Southern States, as are hitherto lead and coal. Flax and hemp are, or may be raised in greater abundance there, than in the more Northern States; and the wool of Virginia is said to be of better quality than that of any other State—a circumstance rendered the more probable by the reflection that Virginia embraces the same latitudes with the finest wool countries of Europe. The climate of the South is also better adapted to the production of silk. The extensive cultivation of cotton can perhaps hardly be expected, but from the previous establishment of domestic manufactures of the article; and the surest encouragement and vent for the others, would result from similar establishments in respect to them.

If, then, it satisfactorily appears, that it is the interest of the United States, generally, to encourage manufactures, it merits particular attention, that there are circumstances which render the present a critical moment for entering with zeal upon the important business. The effort cannot fail to be materially seconded by a considerable and increasing influx of money, in consequence of foreign speculations in the funds, and by the disorders which exist in different parts of Europe.

The first circumstance not only facilitates the execution of manufacturing enterprises, but it indicates them as a necessary mean to turn the thing itself to advantage, and to prevent its being eventually an evil. If useful employment be not found for the money of foreigners brought to the country to be invested in purchases of the Public Debt, it will quickly be re-exported to defray the expense of an extraordinary consumption of foreign luxuries; and distressing drains of our specie may hereafter be experienced to pay the interest, and redeem the principal of the purchased Debt. This useful employment, too, ought to be of a nature to produce solid and permanent improvements. If the money merely serves to give a temporary spring to foreign commerce, as it cannot procure new and lasting outlets for the products of the country, there will be no real or durable advantage gained. As far as it shall find its way in agricultural ameliorations, in opening canals, and in similar improvements, it will be productive of substantial utility. But there is reason to doubt whether, in such channels, it is likely to find sufficient employment, and still more whether many of those who possess it, would be as readily attracted to objects of this nature, as manufacturing pursuits, which bear greater analogy to those to which they are accustomed, and to the spirit generated by them. To open the one field as well as the other, will at least secure a better prospect of useful employment, for whatever accession of money there has been or may be.

There is at the present juncture a certain fermentation of mind, a certain activity of speculation and enterprise, which, if properly directed, may be made subservient to useful purposes, but which, if left entirely to itself, may be attended with pernicious effects.

The disturbed state of Europe inclining its citizens to emigration, the requisite workmen will be more easily acquired than at another time; and the effect of multiplying the opportunities of employment to those who emigrate, may be an increase of the number and extent of valuable acquisitions to the population, arts, and industry of the country. To find pleasure in the calamities of other nations, would be criminal; but to benefit ourselves, by opening an asylum to those who suffer in consequence of them, is as justifiable as it is politic.

A full view having now been taken of the inducements to the promotion of manufactures in the United States, accompanied with an examination of the principal objections which are commonly urged in opposition, it is proper, in the next place, to consider the means by which it may be effected, as introductory to a specification of the objects which, in the present state of things, appear the most fit to be encouraged, and of the particular measures which it may be advisable to adopt, in respect to each.

In order to a better judgment of the means proper to be resorted to by the United States, it will be of use to advert to those which have been employed with success in other countries. The principal of these are—

I. Protecting duties, or duties on those foreign articles which are the rivals of the domestic ones intended to be encouraged. Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics, since, by enhancing the charges on foreign articles, they enable the national manufacturers to undersell all their foreign competitors. The propriety of this species of encouragement need not be dwelt upon, as it is not only a clear result from the numerous topics which have been suggested, but is sanctioned by the laws of the United States, in a variety of instances. It has the additional recommendation of being a resource of revenue. Indeed, all the duties imposed on imported articles, though with an exclusive view to revenue, have the effect in contemplation, and, except where they fall on raw materials, wear a benevolent aspect towards the manufactures of the country.

II. Prohibitions of rival articles, or duties equivalent to prohibitions. This is another and an efficacious mean of encouraging national manufactures, but in general it is only fit to be employed when a manufacture has made such a progress, and is in so many hands as to insure a due competition, and an adequate supply on reasonable terms. Of duties equivalent to prohibitions, there are examples in the laws of the United States, and there are other cases to which the principle may be advantageously extended, but they are not numerous. Considering a monopoly of the domestic market to its own manufacturers as the reigning policy of manufacturing nations, a similar policy on the part of the United States, in every proper instance, is dictated, it might almost be said, by the principles of distributive justice—certainly by the duty of endeavoring to secure to their own citizens a reciprocity of advantage.

III. Prohibitions of the exportation of the materials of manufactures. The desire of securing a cheap and plentiful supply for the national workmen, and, where the article is either peculiar to the country, or of peculiar quality there, the jealousy of enabling foreign workmen to rival those of the nation, with its own materials, are the leading motives to this species of regulation. It ought not to be affirmed, that it is in no instance proper; but it is certainly one which ought to be adopted with great circumspection, and only in very plain cases. It is seen at once, that its immediate operation is, to abridge the demand, and keep down the price of the produce of some other branch of industry—generally speaking, of agriculture—to the prejudice of those who carry it on; and though, if it be really essential to the prosperity of any very important national manufacture, it may happen that those who are injured in the first instance may be eventually indemnified by the superior steadiness of an extensive domestic market depending on that prosperity; yet, in a matter in which there is so much room for nice and difficult combinations, in which such opposite considerations combat each other, prudence seems to dictate that the expedient in question ought to be indulged with a sparing hand.

IV. Pecuniary bounties. This has been found one of the most efficacious means of encouraging manufactures, and it is in some views the best. Though it has not yet been practised upon by the Government of the United States, (unless the allowance on the exportation of dried and pickled fish and salted meat could be considered as a bounty,) and though it is less favored by public opinion than some other modes. Its advantages are these:

First. It is a species of encouragement more positive and direct than any other, and for that very reason, has a more immediate tendency to stimulate and uphold new enterprises, increasing the chances of profit, and diminishing the risks of loss in the first attempt.

Second. It avoids the inconvenience of a temporary augmentation of price, which is incident to some other modes, or it produces it to a less degree, either by making no addition to the charges on the rival foreign article, as in the case of protecting duties, or by making a smaller addition. The first happens when the fund for the bounty is derived from a different object, which may or may not increase the price of some other article, according to the nature of that object; the second, when the fund is derived from the same or a similar object of foreign manufacture. One per cent. duty on the foreign article converted into a bounty on the domestic, will have an equal effect with a duty of two per cent., exclusive of such bounty; and the price of the foreign commodity is liable to be raised in the one case in the proportion of one per cent.; in the other, in that of two per cent. Indeed, the bounty, when drawn from another source, is calculated to promote a reduction of price; because, without laying any new charge on the foreign article, it serves to introduce a competition with it, and to increase the total quantity of the article in the market.

Third. Bounties have not, like high protecting duties, a tendency to produce scarcity. An increase of price is not always the immediate (though where the progress of a domestic manufacture does not counteract a rise, it is commonly the ultimate) effect of an additional duty. In the international increase of price, it may discourage importation, by interfering with the profits to be expected from the sale of the article.

Fourth. Bounties are sometimes not only the best, but the only proper expedient, for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. It is the interest of the farmer to have the production of the raw material promoted, by counteracting the interference of the foreign material of the same kind. It is the interest of the manufacturer to have the material abundant and cheap. If, prior to the domestic production of the material in sufficient quantity to supply the manufacturer on good terms, a duty be laid upon the importation of it from abroad, with a view to promote the raising of it at home, the interest both of the farmer and manufacturer will be disserved, by either destroying the requisite supply, or raising the price of the article beyond what can be afforded to be given for it by the conductor of an infant manufacture, it is abandoned or fails; and, there being no domestic manufactures to create a demand for the raw material which is raised by the farmer, it is in vain that the competition of the like foreign article may have been destroyed.

It cannot escape notice, that a duty upon the importation of an article can no otherwise aid the domestic production of it, than by giving the latter greater advantages in the home market. It can have no influence upon the advantageous sale of the article produced, in foreign markets—no tendency, therefore, to promote its exportation.

The true way to conciliate these two interests is, to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself, or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of the thing, the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable, as to quantity or price of the raw material. And the farmer, if the bounty be immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material; if the bounty be to the manufacturer on so much of the domestic material as he consumes, the operation is nearly the same: he has a motive of interest to prefer the domestic commodity, if of equal quality, even at a higher price than the foreign, so long as the difference of price is anything short of the bounty which is allowed upon the article.
